1. The touch of desire or faith (the verb in this first group is ἀπτεσθαι).—'As many as had plagues pressed upon him, that they might touch him' (Mk 3½). 'They besought him that they might touch if it were but the border of his garment' (Mk 6½). 'A woman . . . came in the crowd behind and touched his garment. For she said, If I touch but his garment, I shall be whole' (5π.22). With these may be associated the act of the woman in Simon's house, who washed Christ's feet with tears, and anointed them with ointment, and of whom the Pharisee said later, 'This man, if he were a prophet, would have perceived who and what manner of woman this is which toucheth him' (Lk 729). first group is απτεσθαι).— 'As many as had plagues

2. The touch of curiosity or indifference.—The most vivid instance of this is in the story above referred to of the woman with an issue of blood, where, in the different Gospels, no less than four Greek words are used to depict the thronging of the multitude, so finely distinguished from the significant touch of faith which brought healing to the sufferer. Mk.'s word is  $\sigma v \rho \theta \lambda (\beta \epsilon v_r)$ , 'throng' (Mk 521). Lk. uses no fewer than three words:  $\sigma v \mu \pi \nu (\gamma \epsilon v_r)$ , lit. 'choke';  $\sigma v \nu \epsilon \gamma \epsilon v_r$ , 'press';  $\delta \pi \sigma - \theta \lambda (\beta \epsilon v_r)$ , 'crush' (Lk 842.46). 'Out of that throngeλίβει, 'crush' (Lk 8<sup>42.45</sup>). 'Out of that thronging multitude one only touched with the touch of faith. Others crowded upon Him, but did not touch Him, did not so touch that virtue went forth from Him on them' (Trench).

3. The hostile hold of restraint or enmity.—Since, in dealing with the touch of Christ, we included instances of His 'laying hands' on others, so in pathetic contrast the following instances must be included here. 'And when his friends heard it, they went out to lay hold on him' (κοατβααι heard it, they went out to lay hold on him' (κρατῆσαι αὐτόν, the word often used of Christ's more kindly activity) (Mk 3<sup>2</sup>). 'No man laid hands on him  $(\ell\pi\ell\beta\alpha\lambda\epsilon\nu \tau \tau)\nu \chi\epsilon\ell\rho\alpha$ ), for his hour was not yet come' (Jn 7<sup>20</sup>). Though the connexion be not one of verbal identity, such references to a false or hostile kiss of Judas (Mk 14th), and the smiting in the high priest's palace (v.65).

4. It is better to class separately the very interesting references to the touching of our Lord after the Resurrection. These are as follows: 'They came and took hold of his feet (ἐκράτησαν αὐτοῦ τοὺς πόδας), and worshipped him' (Mt 289)—the roots, and worshipped him (Mt 28°)—the permitted grasp of recognition and adoration. 'Handle me  $(\psi\eta\lambda\alpha\phi\eta\sigma\tau\epsilon\ \mu\epsilon)$ , and see' (Lk 24°); 'Reach hither thy hand  $(\phi\epsilon\rho\epsilon\ \tau\eta\nu\ \chi\epsilon\bar{\iota}\rho\delta\ \sigma\upsilon)$ , and put it into my side' (Jn 20°)—the solicited touch of reverent experiment. 'Touch me not  $(\mu\eta\ \mu\upsilon\ d\pi\tau\upsilon)$ , for I am not yet ascended unto the Father' (Jn 20°) the forbidden handling of selfish and premature rapture.

When God and man were brought near in the Incarnation, it was natural that the Divine hand should be seen stretched out manwards in healing and help (see above); but natural also that human hands should be seen groping Godwards, seeking closer contact. An American missionary bishop tells of an Indian who knocked one day at his door, and said: 'I have often gone out into the woods, and said: 'I have often gone out into the woods, and tried to talk to a Great Spirit of whom my father told me. But I could never find Him. Perhaps you don't know what I mean. You never stood in the dark, and reached out your hand, and could not take hold of anything.' The idea is precisely that of St. Paul; men 'seek the Lord, if haply they may handle him' (ψηλαφήσειαν αὐτζν, Ac 17<sup>27</sup>). Now it is this identical word, strangely enough, that our Lord uses in the gracious invitation to His disciples: 'Why are ye troubled? See my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see.' In the Incarnation this longing has been responded to. So that, when St. John has been responded to. So that, when St. John sets forth the main purpose of his First Epistle, he uses this same word again, and with what Westcott declares to be a 'distinct reference' to the passage in Luke, he states that purpose to be the disclosure to others of 'that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life' (1 Jn 11).

In the Incarnation, then, God has put Himself where men might touch Him; and in the various instances of touching Christ, grouped above, we see how men responded to this opportunity. There were those who sought with all their hearts for closer contact, impelled by the sense of need, or by the impulse of adoring love; 'the history of all God's dealings with man is the record of an approach nearer still, and nearer . . . until faith puts its fingers into the print of the nails, its hand into the wounded side, and constrains us to cry, My Lord, and my God' (Ker, l.c.). There were those who merely jostled and thronged our Lord, but obtained no blessing, because enlightened by no deep desire. And there were those whose only impulse towards God manifest in the flesh was one of repudiation and dislike.

Only one passage of those quoted above seems at first sight to put itself outside the general symbolism. This is the record of our Lord's saying to Mary Magdalene: 'Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended unto the Father, —a passage of which the interpretations are nearly as numerous as the commentators. But is not the explanation to be found in the present tense of the injunction, combined with the contrasted command, 'But go,' etc.—as though our Lord were saying, 'Keep not on touching me, making sure of me in a selfish rapture, for the duty of the moment calls thee to be a witness to others; handle me not, but go to my brethren, and say unto them'? And if it be objected, as by Godet, that on that view the following words, 'I am not yet ascended,' present 'absolutely no sense,' the answer is that the hour was coming later, when, after the gift of the Spirit, close and intimate communion with Christ could be given along with the work of witness and service,—when it would be possible for a soul to be both in contact with the living Lord and also a messenger for Him,—when (in other words) the disciple could be in 'touch' with Christ by His Spirit and also 'go' on His errands.

R. STEVENSON. TOWEL.—'Towel' in the two passages in which it occurs in the Gospels (Jn 13th) represents λέρτιον, which is clearly the Latin linteum, a word meaning, in the first instance, 'linen cloth,' and then 'napkin' or 'apron' worn by slaves or servants, and especially 'bath-towel.' Under the Empire this Latin word made its way not only into Greek, but also into late Hebrew in the form 'alun(th.
It is found in the Mishna (Shabbath xxii, 5) of the bath-towels used at the hot baths of Tiberias and That slaves or attendants were the elsewhere. linteum is more than once referred to in the The best known passage is in Phad. Fab. II. v. 11 ff., where an officious attendant of Tiberius, who was snubbed for his pains, is described as-

'Ex alticincus unus atriensibus Cul tunica ab humeris linteo Pelusio Erat destricta.'

Less known, but even more interesting, as at the same time supplying parallel and contrast, is the anecdote given by Suctonius (Calig. 26) of the humbling of distinguished senators by the mad Carsar Caligula, by allowing them to stand at his couch or his feet, girt with towels (succinctor disteo). This is evidently recorded as a grave indignity to which the haughty Romans submitted with the greatest reluctance.

TOWER. -- 'Tower' (πύργοι) is mentioned three times in the Lord's teaching: in the parable of the Wicked Husbandmen (Mt 21°, Mk 12¹), in the allusion to an accident in Siloam which led to the loss of cickten lives (L 12¹), and in the illustration loss of eighteen lives (Lk 134), and in the illustration of the builder who was unable to complete his undertaking (Lk 14<sup>30</sup>). Two, if not three, kinds of tower may be referred to in these passages: (1) The builder who exposed himself to ridicule by beginning what he could not finish (Lk 1420) may be thought of as building a house. The larger houses in the Holy Land are sometimes provided at one end with a tower-like annex. A good representation of one in the neighbourhood of Sidon is given in the Polychroma Bible ('Judges,' p. 50). The 'allyyah or upper storey, seen from a little distance, must suggest a tower rather than a dwellinghouse (see also Land and Book, ed. 1874, p. 160). (2) The tower in Siloam (& τφ Σιλωάμ, Lk 134) may have been connected with some fortifications. walls of ancient Oriental cities were generally provided with towers at frequent intervals. Many illustrations could be given from Assyrian sculptures, and the old wall in the Jerusalem of the 1st cent A.D. had sixty towers (Jos. BJ v. iv. 3), two of which, Hippicus and Phasaelus, are probably two of which, Hippicus and Phasaelus, are probably represented to some extent by two of the towers of the modern citadel, the latter being partly preserved in the so-called David's Tower (Picturesque Palestine, i. pp. 1, 5, 7-11). Edersheim (Life of Jesus the Messich, ii. 222) suggests that the tower may have been connected with the building of the aqueduct constructed by Pdate with money taken from the temple treasury (Jos. Aut. XVIII. iii. 2; BJ H. ix. 4); but that is unsupported conjecture. If the Tower was situated literally in Siloam, the nature of the ground may help to explain the accident. The village of Silvoin, which represents the ancient Silvain, 'is built on a steep escarpment of rock, on which a building with good foundations would stand for ever; ill-laid foundations would drop their superstructure to the very bottom of the valley '(Hastings' DB, art. 'Tower'). For the twalley '(Hastings' DB, art. 'Tower'). For the Tower of Antonia see art. Jerusalem (3) The vineyard tower referred to in the two other passages (Mt 21<sup>23</sup>, Mk 12<sup>1</sup>; cf. Is 5<sup>2</sup>) can be illustrated from ancient ruins and modern practice. Tristram remarks (Eastern Customs in Bible Lands, p. 139f) that 'in many cases we still find the remains of the solidly-built tower which com-manded a view of the whole enclosure, and was probably the permanent residence of the keeper through the summer and autumn.' Dr. W. Wright observes that every vineyard and garden in Syria has its tower (Palmyra and Zenobia, p. 332 f.). representation is given in that work (p. 279) of a stone tower in the Hanran constructed of black basalt, with a stone loft at the height of 14 feet, reached by a spiral staircase (see also Porter, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, and Bethany, p. 18; Stanley, Sinas and Palestine, 421).

TRACHONITIS .- A Roman province of Eastern Palestine over which Herod Philip held rule when John the Baptist entered upon his public ministry (Lk 3¹). The Greek word τραχωνίτι οι τραχων sig-nifies a 'rough or stony place,' and its identifica-tion with the wild and rugged volcanic region within the limits of ancient Bashan, which the Arabs designate d-Lejā ('the refuge'), is unquestioned. This was the heart, as well as the most notable portion, of the province, and gave to it its distinctive name. The phrase τραχωνίτιδος χώρας ("the Trachonite region," Lk 3") implies an extent of territory beyond the limits of the Trachon, or lava-bed section. The name does not occur elsewhere in the NT, but the boundaries of the province can be approximately defined, from staterents concerning it in the works of Josephus, Ptolemy, Strabo, and other writers. Josephus informs us that its N.W. limit extended to the districts of Ulatha and Paneas, at the southern base of Mount Hermon; and also that it bordered on Auranitis (en-Nukra) and Batanea (Ant. XV. x. 3, XVII. ii. 1; BJ I. xx. 4). The line of the western border is not definitely given, but it probably extended to the eastern limit of Gaulanitis (Jaulan), which is frequently alluded to as a separate district of Herod Philip's dominion.

R. L. STEWART. TRADE AND COMMERCE.—1. The terms.
The terms used in the NT in its allusions to mer cantile transactions give but little indication of the remarkable developments which had taken place in the trade and commerce of Palestine since OT times.

Schurer (**J*F*** ji, 80-61) gives a considerable list of trading terms which had been borrowed from the Greek, and were in ordinary use among Palestinian Jews, but few of these appear in the NT. The only term, e.g., for 'marchant' is intress (Mt 1345, Rei 185-11 15-25), this being the equivalent etymiologically of the two terms which are common in OT. AND and 5.5%-obth of which seem to have the root idea of travel, whether by land or sea. What is, however, significant is the frequency of the words $\frac{1}{2}$ and $\frac{1}{2}$ as $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{1}{2}$ \frac{1}{2}$) and or sea. What is, however, significant is the frequency of the words $\frac{1}{2}$ as $\frac{1}{2}$ as $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{1}{2}$ \frac{1}{2}$) and $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{1}{2}$ \frac{1}{2}$) and $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{1}{2}$) as $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{1}{2}$) and $\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{1}{2}$) by-both of which seem to have the root idea of travel,

2. The status of the trader.- There is consider able evidence that in Herodian times the occupation of a merchant was held in more repute than had formerly been the case among the Jews. Such a statement as that of Josephus—'We have no taste for commerce or for the relations with strangers which it establishes' (c. Apion, i. 12), must not be taken too literally (cf. Herzfeld, Handelsgesch. der Juden, p. 80). Josephus himself meles numerous experience to the widespread self makes numerous references to the widespread trade carried on by Alexandrian Jews, without any implication that they incurred disparagement thereby; he mentions the 'Upper Market-place' of Jerusalem; the Valley of the Cheesemongers (BJ v. iv. 1), the wool-merchants, the cloth-mart (v. viii. 1), the timber-market (II. xix. 4); he tells us of the exportation of corn from Judæa to Arabia (Ant. XIV. v. 1), and through Joppa to Phænicia (XIV. x. 6); he mentions the influence which a Jewish trader, Ananias, exercised at the court of Adiabene (xx. ii. 3, 4); he relates how John of Giscala made himself rich by obtaining the monopoly of exporting oil from Galilee (BJ II. xxi. 2); and in various places indicates the growing prosperity and affluence of the Jews (e.g. Ant. XII. iv. 10, Vit. 26, etc.). In no case do we discover any indication that the fact of engaging in trade was a reflexion upon a true Jew, so long as he took care not to defile himself by such contact as the Law forbade (cf. Mk 74 'when they come as the Law forbade (cf. Mk / When they come from the market-place, except they wash themselves they eat not?). There can be little doubt that the encouragement which high priests like John Hyrcanus gave to trade, and the fact that the property the results are the fact that Herodian princes themselves engaged in it, tended to raise the status of the Jewish trader. Priests were sometimes themselves traders. Josephus describes the high priest Ananias as a keen moneylender (Ant. xx. ix. 2). There were, of course, different grades of traders recognized. Sirach (2629) distinguishes between a merchant and a huckster. Between the merchant prince and the mere pedlar there was a vast variety of persons who found no difficulty in reconciling their commerce with their religion, and perhaps we may infer from the following that even the humblest trade was not despised: 'Rabbi Jehudah the Nasi called Elazar b. Azariah a huckster's basket, and compared him to a huckster who, taking his basket, goes about the country, and the people come flock-ing around him, inquiring for various articles, and find he has everything '(Aboth, 2). In the Gospels the allusions to persons engaged in trade take it for granted that merchants have a responsible and even an honourable place in the national economy. In the parable of the Pounds (Lk 1912-27), a man of noble birth carries on trade through the agency of his servants, and there seems to be no sufficient reason for A. B. Bruce's supposition (Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 219) that such a transaction was 'a most unusual one for a nobleman.' In the East, indeed, royalty from early times had associated itself closely with the development of trade." The teaching of Jesus is 'full of appreciation of the bigness of the methods of trade and of the brave tempers required in it.' + The gradual change by which the Jews, from being an agricultural people, became a people devoted to commerce, is illustrated by many Talmudic passages: e.g. 'Rabbi Eleazar said, There is no worse trade than agriculture; and Rabbi Rab added, Commerce is worth all the harvests of the world' (Jebamoth, 63. 1). This change, however, took place only very slowly; the time of Christ was the transition period, and while there were many pious Jews who did not hesitate to engage in foreign trade, there were others who viewed it with suspicion and dislike, and some who would have nothing to do with it. Essenes abjured trade, apparently, at least among themselves (BJ II. viii. 4). The two things which laid a stigma upon it were (1) the extensive contact with foreigners which it involved, and the consequent risk of ceremonial pollution; and (2) the moral deterioration which it seemed to bring.

The fact that Sirach has several passages emphasizing the latter danger indicates the prevalent fear that, with the growth of Hellenistic influences, there was coming in a relaxation of Hebrew strictness and integrity: e.g. 'A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong, and a huckster shall not be acquitted of sin' (Sir 2529); 'Sin will thrust itself in between buying and selling' (272); 'Take not counsel with a merchant about exchange nor with a buyer about selling' (3711) between buying and selling' (273); 'Take not counsel with a merchant about exchange nor with a buyer about selling' (3711).

Delitzsch, indeed, thinks that it was not until about 500 years after Christ that the Jewish people began to show any special preference for those branches of trade which deal in work furnished by others (Jewish Artian Life in the time of Christ, p. 19), but the passages which he quotes appear to be not so much indicative of the Jew's aversion from trade, as such, as instances of the feeling that a commercial occupation is hardly compatible with a devout life: e.g. 'Wisdom, says Rabbi Jochanan, in reference to Dt 3012, is not in heaven,—that is to say, not to be found among the proud; nor beyond the sea—that is to say, you will not find it among traders and travelling merchants' (ib. and Erubin, 55a).

In the NT there is no disparagement of trade as such. A passage like Ja 413 'Go to now, ye that say, To-day or tomorrow we will go into this city and spend a year there and trade (iarospaiausi)' is not directed against trading, but only against that commercial spirit which leaves God out of account. The passage Rev 1816. (based on Ezk 27) suggests, not the prevalence of an anti-trade spirit in the early Christian community, but a Puritanic protest against the excessive luxury of a materialistic society.* Whatever the obscure passage Rev 1316 'that no man should be able to buy or to sell save he that hath the mark, even the name of the beast or the number of his name,' may mean, the writer can hardly be taken to mean more than that the habits of trade were so mixed up with pegan practices that it was difficult for a Christian to be a trader without becoming stamped with the 'mark of the beast.' In this connexion it may be noted that Deissmann (Bible Studies, p. 241 fl.) finds a reference to seals, bearing the name of the Roman emperor, which seem to have been necessary in documents of a commercial nature. We may, at any rate, set over against Delitzsch's assertion that 'in the whole Talmud t

8. Commercial morality. - From some of the passages already quoted it might be inferred that trade in the Roman Empire in the 1st cent. was particularly corrupt. Was this actually so? It is, of course, not difficult to put together a number of instances in which the trader appears as a person of smirched reputation. Autolycus had his parallel in Palestine. The merchants of Lydda parallel in Palestine. The merchants of Lydda seem to have been notorious for dishonesty (according to Pesachim, 62b). Sirach (29<sup>1-7</sup>) dwells upon the difficulty of getting loans repaid, and upon the ready excuse of 'bad times.' Zacchæus (Lk 19<sup>1-10</sup>), who probably farmed the revenues from the famous balsam-gardens of Jericho (see Jos. BJ IV. viii. 3, Ant. XIV. iv. 1; cf. G. A. Smith, HGHL p. 267, note), was, according to the generally received interpretation given to un. generally received interpretation, given to un-scrupulous exaction. In the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-5</sup>) we have a graphic picture of a factor whose dealings are a tissue of knavery. It is probable, too, that the publicans, who appear in the Gospels with so poor a reputation, owed this partly to a shady connexion with the traffic which passed through their hands. But it is obviously unfair to assume from such data as these that there was any more dishonesty among Jewish than among other traders. Herzfeld justly claims (p. 276 f.) that, though the reproach of usury attached to the Jews of the Middle Ages, it appears that among the Jews of earlier times the rate of interest was lower than among other peoples engaged in trade. The enemics of the Jews in Roman times did not scruple to bring against them the most ridiculous charges, but pre-cisely this charge of dishonesty in business re-lations is not found. In the Talmud usurers are lations is not found. In the Talmud usurers are regarded as in the same category with gamblers (Rosh ha-shana, i. 8). Surely, too, the close connexion between business and religion, which is so often emphasized in the Bible (e.g. Lv 19<sup>25, 26</sup> 25<sup>26, 37</sup>, Dt 15<sup>2</sup> 23<sup>20</sup>, Pr 11<sup>1</sup> 16<sup>11</sup> 20<sup>10</sup> 23<sup>24, 28, 22</sup>, Am 8<sup>5</sup>, Mic 6<sup>10, 11</sup>, cf. Sir 42<sup>4</sup>), and of which the Talmudic writers have so much to say (cf. Herzfeld, p. 162 f.), was not without its effect upon mercantile morality. That trade was directly recognized as having the sanction of religion would appear from an allusion (Jonna, v. 3) to a prayer offered by the having the sanction of religion would appear from an allusion (Joma, v. 3) to a prayer offered by the high priest on the Day of Atonement for 'a year of trade and traffic.' The indignation of Jesus when He ejected the traders and money-changers from the Temple courts (Mt 21<sup>12-18</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12-18</sup>, Lk 19<sup>42-47</sup>, Jn 2<sup>14-18</sup>) must no doubt have been prompted partly by a knowledge of the dishonesty of their dealings ('a den of robbers'); but His denunciation is a quotation from Jeremiah (7<sup>11</sup>), and must not be pressed. What stirred His wrath was the conjunction of unscrupulousness with high was the conjunction of unscrupulousness with high religious pretensions. It was because their practice was not in harmony with their principles that He drove them forth. That they suffered it with so little resistance seems to show a tacit admission on their part that they were departing from the strictness of Jewish law. Jesus never singles out the trader, as such, as an example of covetousness or fraud; when He inveighs against corrupt practices, it is rather the Pharisees 'who devour widows' houses' (Mk 1240), and who are 'full from extortion' (Mt 2325) that are selected for castigation. If, as is not improbable, the Good Samaritan of Lk  $10^{30-37}$  was suggested by the merchants who travelled regularly on the trade-route that led through Jericho (cf. v.*), we have an instance of the way in which Jesus contrasted the humanity often characterizing men of the world with the inhumanity which professors of religion may be capable of showing.

4. Relations of Jesus with the mercantile community.-It has been said * that the trade of Palestine is often reflected in the parables of Jesus spoken as He passed along the busy trade-routes of Galilee and Judea. Typical of these is the parable of the Merchant seeking Goodly Pearls (Mt 13<sup>45,46</sup>). Jesus would be sure to meet traders on His frequent journeys. Merchandise was still carried, for the most part probably, on packanimals—asses, mules, or camels (cf. Jos. Vit. 26 f.); for, though under Imperial Rome there had been a great development of the means of transit, and a fast service of conveyances had been established on the great trunk roads of the Empire, this would hardly be the case in Palestine in the time of Jesus. But conditions had arisen more favourable to commerce: the roads were safer; brigandage was put down with a strong hand (Jos. Ant. XIV. ix. 2, xv. 4); in addition to the usual town-markets, which in the time of the Maccabees seem to have been held monthly, and to which the country people came in (1 Mac 158, cf. Herzfeld, p. 75 f.), there was a good deal of trade done at the regular stopping-places of the caravans, and at the inns; periodical fairs also sprang up at certain places, c.g. Gaza, Acco, and Tyre (Herzfeld, p. 134). In the towns, at any rate the larger towns, merchants would have their recognized towns, merchants would have their recognized exchange for corn, wool, etc., and their bazaars for manufactured articles. They had their trade guilds, capable sometimes of exercising a considerable influence (cf. Ac 19<sup>23f.</sup>), and their trade leagues between neighbouring towns, e.g. those * EBi, art. 'Trade and Commerce,' 5191a.

of Decapolis (Herzfeld, p. 148; HGHL p. 595); there were trading corporations, which had their representatives in the important centres. Thus, there were Antiochian Jews settled in Jerusalem presumably for purposes of trade (2 Mac 4<sup>9, 19</sup>), and there is little doubt that at the times of the great feasts, many who came up to Jerusalem combined business with religion, and used the opportunity to establish trade relations with their fellow-countrymen coming from other parts of the Empire. The sea, now cleared of pirates, no longer offered obstruction to the spread of commerce; the Jews had at last ports of their own; Philo (in Flaccum, 8) refers to Jewish shipmasters at Alexandria; Josephus (Ant. XVIII. ix.) and the Talmud refer to the wealth of Babylonian Jews. Through Galilee ran some of the most frequented trade-routes; and in this province, more than elsewhere, the influence of the enterprising Greek was in evidence.

Jesus was in close contact, then, with the busy traffic of His day, and the allusions to it in the Gospels are many; e.g. the trade in oil (Mt 25°), in spices (Mk 16' 14's, Jn 19'30; an indication of the extent of this traffic may be gathered from the statement made by Josephus, that at Herod's funeral there were 500 spice-bearers [Ant. xvII. viii. 3]), in clothes (Mk 15<sup>26</sup>, Lk 22<sup>26</sup>), in cattle (Lk 14<sup>19</sup>), in weapons (Lk 22<sup>26</sup>). It is a little remarkable that there is no special reference to what must have been the trade best known to Christ's disciples, that in dried fish, for which Taricheæ on the Lake of Galilee was a famous centre (Strabo, xvi. ii. 45; BJ III. x. 6; HGHL p. 455). Absorption in trade is hinted at in the case of the man who neglects the king's invitation, that he may go to his merchandise (Mt 22°), and in Mt 1825 we get a glimpse into a trade the dimensions and importance of which must have been much greater than is indicated by anything in the NT,—the slave-trade. This, however, would be wholly in the lands of foreigners, its chief centre being at Delos (Strabo, XIV. v. 2), where as many as 10,000 slaves might be found at one time. Phonician merchants seem to have been the usual intermediaries in this traffic (1 Mac 34, 2 Mac 811, Ant. XII. vii. 3); and, while the only direct allusion to the slave-merchant in the NT is Rev 1813, this personage must have been a too familiar figure on the roads of Galilee.

TRADES.—It had long been a custom, which almost had the force of law, among the Jews, that every youth, of whatever station, must have a trade. The Rabbis insisted upon it. Of the distinguished teachers in the days of Herod the Great, Hillel and Shammai learned and wrought the trade of mechanics. So with Gamaliel, a contemporary of our Lord. It was quite usual, though by no means universal, for a son to follow the trade of his father, as Jesus did that of Joseph, who was a carpenter (Mt 135, Mk 63). Tradition says Jesus made ploughs, ox-yokes, chairs, and the like. The most common trades of Christ's day were those of the smith, the carpenter, the stone-mason, the baker, the tanner, the sandal-maker, the weaver, the spinner, the wool-comber, the tailor, the tent-maker, the potter, the perfumer, the jeweller, the fuller. These occupations are seldom directly mentioned in the Gospels, but the implements or wares connected with many of them are referred to, or are used as illustrations in parables of our Lord: ploughs and yokes, work of the carpenter, Lk 962, Mt 1129; of the mason, Lk 235, Mt 2142; of the weaver, Mt 34, Jn 1923; of the tailor, Mk 221; the fuller, Mk 98; of digging, Lk 163; of spinning, Mt 62

While mechanical labour was regarded with honour among the Jews, all the trades were not looked upon with equal respect. The tanner, probably because of the unclean nature of his work, the donkey-driver, the butcher, and the followers of a few other occupations, were more or less of a few other occupations, were indeed to less discredited. Sewing, weaving (Jn 19<sup>23</sup>), spinning (Lk 12<sup>27</sup>), grinding (Mt 24<sup>11</sup>), baking (Mt 13<sup>28</sup>), and the like, were largely occupations of women. The industry of catching and curing fish (see art. Fish) was a most important one, more particularly about the Sea of Galilee; Jesus called several of His disciples from this occupation, Mt 418, Mk16. See separate articles on several of the trades above E. B. POLLARD.

TRADITION.—In its simplest and most primitive form, the conception of tradition involves what is contained in the English word delivery. Tradition is the act of transmitting the story of an event or the teaching of a master. From being thus first of all the act of transmission, it becomes in the next place the thing transmitted, and finally a whole body of narratives or teachings passed from genera-tion to generation. In the history of all religions, traditions play a very important part. The times of Jesus and the Gospels were not exceptional in this regard. Explicit mention of tradition is made in Mt 152. 3. 6, Mk 73. 5. 8. 9. 13. Both of these passages refer to the same transaction, and therefore represent the same condition of affairs in the environment and the same attitude on the part of Jesus towards the subject.

The environment was as thoroughly pervaded by the recognition of the authority of tradition as any other that we know of, either in ancient or in modern times. In fact, it stands pre-eminent in this particular (Mt 15<sup>2</sup>, Mk 7<sup>2</sup>). The Sadducees took exception to the prevalent state of mind (Jos. Ant. XIII. x. 6); but the attitude of the Pharisees was the very opposite, and exerted a dominant influence in the matter. In the Talmud it was written that 'Moses received the oral Law from Sinai and delivered it to Joshua, and Joshua delivered it to the elders, and the elders to the prophets, and the prophets to the men of the Great Synagogue. They said three things: Be deliberate in judgment, raise up many disciples, and make a fence for the Law' (Aboth i.). The Rabbis interpreted Ex 201 as involving the idea that all that was to guide the Israelite into the knowledge of the nature and the law of God had been given to Moses on Mount Sinai. More expressly, they found the different parts of the complex rule of faith advocated in the phraseology of Ex 24<sup>12</sup>. The expression used in this passage is, 'I will give thee the tables of stone, and the law, and the commandments, which I have written, that thou mayest keep them.' The 'tables of stone' were understood to mean the Ten Commandments; 'the law,' the written prescriptions of the Pentateuch; 'the commandments,' the Mishna; 'which I have written,' the prophets and Hagiographa; 'that thou mayest teach them,' the Talmud (Berakh. 5a, lines 11-16). A place was thus made for a large body of precepts which do not appear in the OT Scriptures; and all this was of at least equal authority with the written Law, because given at the same time and through the same person, Moses. To the question why it was not written down at the same time as the written Law, the answer was that Moses did indeed desire to reduce it to writing, but was forbidden by God, because in the days to come Israel would be scattered among the Gentiles, and the written Law would be taken from them; the oral Law would then be the distinctive badge of the Israelite.

By some it was held that the oral or traditional Law was even superior to the written, because the latter was dependent for its authority upon the oral testimony of Moses. In other words, the oral precedes and underlies the written. The covenant was founded not on the written, but on the oral word of God; for it is said, 'after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel' (Ex 3427).

From the nature of the case, tradition was not a clearly defined body. A large portion of it was simply a repetition of the written Law, with elaborations of detail and embellishments. Another portion consisted of distinct additions, a third of provisions looking to the strict observance of the Torah. As far as this tradition was prescriptive or legal, it was called Halākhā (-khôth), i.c. deor legal, it was caned interior, i.e. decision (or decisions) having the force of statutes. As far as it was narrative, it was called Haggādā (that which is related). As a reiteration of the Mosaic Law, it was called Mishna (repetition). As a series of questionings into or investigations of the meaning of the Law, it was called Midrāsh (Midrāshīm). As a means of teaching, or the body of what was to be taught, it was the Talmud. The whole body of tradition together with the Prophets and Hagiographa, in fact the whole rule of faith with the exception of the Pentateuch, was called Kabbālāh, that which is received. A doctrine of paralepsis was thus developed, to correlate with the doctrine of paradosis, 'tradition.'

The administration or practical use of such a body of tradition was not an easy matter. In fact, for the average layman it was an impossibility; hence the rise of a class of men who devoted themselves to the work of studying it, and informing inquirers about it (see SCRIBES, LAWYERS). But this method raised the interpreters of the Law to a place of authority. Interpretations of the Law were accepted as binding, because they said so, not because the Law was seen to involve them. The Law was obeyed not because its Divine origin was perceived, but upon the authority of men. Tradition thus came to be doubly the enthronement of human authority. On the one side, it massed together man-made rules and representations of God's thought; on the other side, it wrought out man-made interpreta-tions of the Law which truly came from God. For the former a direct Divine authority was claimed in the teaching that they were actually delivered to Moses on Sinai; some corroboration for each separate precept thus brought down was sought for in the written Law. For the latter not even this semblance of connexion with the known revelation of God could be adduced. In neither case could the stream rise higher than its source. The teachings of men came to take the place which belonged to those of God. It could not go further back than the elders (Fathers), and those who were called upon to accept it must do so upon the authority of human statements. Tradition thus canonized the media of communication, and lost sight of the value and validity of the things communicated on one side, and of the authority of Him from whom the communication came on the other. Whatever the claim for the Divine origin of the Mishna might be, the practical result of its acceptance was the exaltation of the means through which it came to the supreme place of authority.

Jesus' attitude towards tradition relates itself decidedly to this aspect of it. He saw in it a means of transgressing the commandments of God. He denied first of all the Pharisaic teaching that tradition was of equal weight with the Law. He did not, however, definitely affiliate Himself with the Sadducaic teachings on the subject. As against the Pharisees, He taught that the Law of God could not come in conflict with itself, whereas between the traditions current and the Law there were conflicts. In many cases traditional prescriptions did stand in the way of the right observance of the Law (Mk 7<sup>110</sup>). As contrasted with the Divine Law, He calls the tradition 'your tradition.' Finally, He classes all tradition with matters of form or lip-service. He relegates the application of it into the sphere of the non-ethical. So far as such traditions could be made serviceable in the promotion of ethical or spiritual ends, they might be unobjectionable, but they must in no case stand in the way of the clearly revealed will of God (Mt 15<sup>2-20</sup>, Mk 7<sup>2-23</sup>. TRANSFIGURATION.—The name given to that event in the course of Christ's ministry in which He was visibly glorified in the presence of three selected disciples. Difficulty has always attached to any attempt to explain it. That it represents a singular enhancement of His Person and a singular attestation of His message was seen from the beginning (2 P 1<sup>16-18</sup>). As such it took its natural place among the evidences of His Divinity. To that position its significance has been very generally limited, and there conceived for the most part in a purely external manner. The paucity of essential ideas associated with it has diverted attention to its details, which have lent themselves to much conjectural and picturesque description, too realistic in character to be serviceable to knowledge. In recent NT scholarship a new interest in the event has sprung up, directed by the modern analytical study of Christ's self-consciousness, and discerning in the experience it embodies a moment of profound import in His self-development.

1. Narratives of the event.—(1) The evidence for the Transfiguration is remarkably strong. It is recorded by all three Synopties in its incidents, and by the Fourth Gospel in its inner mood (Mt 171-9, Mk 9<sup>2-10</sup>, Lk 9<sup>28-26</sup>, Jn 12<sup>23-41</sup>). In the first three Gospels both the precision of detail and the agreement are striking, including the following facts: the occasion—six days after the preceding incidents just narrated; the place—a high mountain apart; the chosen three—Peter, James, John; the supernatural light; the heavenly visitants and their speech; the suggestion of Peter; the overshadowing cloud and the Divine voice from its midst; the away yet joy of the disciples; the midst; the awe, yet joy, of the disciples; the return of Christ to ordinary conditions of human life; the charge of silence. Additional features of importance are given by Lk. (92st.): the motive of the ascent, viz. prayer, during which the unearthly lustre appeared; the subject of discourse, viz. the decease which He should accomplish at Jerusalem (v.31); the physical state of the disciples, viz. 'heavy with sleep, and, having kept themselves awake, they saw his glory' (v. 22); together with two points of time, viz. 'about eight days' (v. 28), and the descent from the hill 'the next day' (v. 37). Touches, less important, peculiar to the others, are Christ's allaying the fear of the disciples (Mt 177), and Peter's embarrassment and agitation (Mk 96). The silence of Jn. has been specially commented on as weakening the authority of the Synoptic witness (cf. Strauss, Leben Jesu, pt. ii.

c. 10). But when we recognize the totally different animus narrandi in his case from that which we discover in the Synoptics, we may be reassured. The Fourth Gospel separates itself from the others in making prominent the fact that the motif and explanation of Christ's words and acts are to be found, not in the circumstances and persons around Him, but in a higher necessity incumbent on Him in virtue of His nature or His office or His work or the will of God, i.e. a higher law at work. Accordingly we may expect in the Fourth Gospel, less the outward incidents * and more the interior less the outward incidents and more the interior mood corresponding to them, to be emphasized. There can be little doubt that the Johannine counterpart of the Synoptic narration is to be found in Jn 12<sup>22-41</sup>, the passage which stands between the record of Christ's public ministry and the ensuing scenes of His glorifying through death, resurrection and agreement a position identical with rection, and ascension—a position identical with that occupied by the Transfiguration event in the Synoptics.

The details of the Transfiguration are seldom referred to throughout the rest of the NT. Explicit allusion is made only once, viz. in 2 P 1<sup>16-18</sup>, a writing whose authenticity is seriously doubted.† The effort (Jannaris, ExpT xiv. [1903] 462) to find in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel a direct reference to the Transfiguration is of interest, but unconvincing. Better material may be found in unconvincing. Better material may be found in such passages as 1 Jn 11-4, Rev 113-17, He 13.4 32.6.7, such passages as I In Italy, Rev I and Jacob 1, 2 Co 46, in which we have statements obviously coloured from immediate conviction of Christ's visible glorification; even here, however, we have only indirect testimony. The extra-Synoptic reticence is not to be denied. It is quite explicable. It is a reticence only as to details: the idea of the Transfiguration story is so manifestly accepted that he who runs may read. In the Epistles the aim of the writers is not historical statement, but doctrinal elucidation and practical edification—an aim which calls for but slight advertence to the outward facts of Christ's earthly life. There is, too, the clear belief in the minds of the writers that all those facts pale in impressiveness and meaning before that of the Resurrection, the event which is not simply analogous to them, but that in which they find their rationale and explanation. By that fact more than by any other the glory of Christ's Person was revealed, and the Divine purpose and message in Him realized. In the light of it, the Transfiguration appeared but its pledge and fore-cast (cf. Mt 17°, Mk 9°). It is probably true to affirm that the central idea of the event lay in its significance for Christ Himself rather than for His disciples, who are brought in more as spectators of its marvel than as participants in its meaning.

(2) The place of the Transfiguration is not definitely located in the Gospels. The phrases are in Mt. and Mk. 'unto an high mountain apart,' and in Lk. 'into a mountain.' Earlier tradition almost ‡ unanimously fixed on Mt. Tabor—a tradition which has enshrined itself in the calendar of the Eastern Church, where the Festival of the Transfiguration is celebrated on 6th Aug. as τὸ Θαβώριον. opinion almost as unanimously regards as more likely Mt. Hermon, either one of its spurs or even its summit (Conder, Tent-Work in Palestine). The argument relies mainly on the fact of the distance of Mt. Tabor, lying near Nazareth, far to the south from Cæsarea Philippi in the N.W., in whose neighbourhood the immediately preceding incidents took place. The departure of Christ and His company of the company of the standard will late M. took place. The departure of Christ and His company from Cæsarea is not mentioned till later (Mt

17th, Mk 9th). There is, perhaps, a certain fitness in the Transfiguration scene having occurred in the vicinity of its intimate antecedents, and in the intense atmosphere charged with their novel and perplexing intimations. It is perhaps, too, not a mere fancy that Hermon's glittering cone of snow suggested. Mk is expression, level last words are to be admitted into the text.

(3) There is a little more definiteness about the Each of the three narrators connects OCCUPACION. it by time with what goes before 'eight days'; the latter (Lk ) evidently, according to the common Jewish reckoning, inclusive. The note of time is not without a purpose. The link is intentional between the new wonder and the surprising revelations recounted. Those were three in number: (a) the great confession by Peter of Christ's Messianic dignity (Mt 1612-28, Mk 827-28, Lk 913-21); (b) our Lord's solemn announcement of His near suffering (Mt 16<sup>21</sup> *, Mk 8<sup>31</sup> *), Lk 9<sup>22</sup> *); and (c) the definite prediction of His coming in His Kingdom (Mt 16<sup>21</sup> *), Mk 8<sup>28</sup> 9<sup>3</sup>, Lk 9<sup>26</sup> **). Compare with these the statements concerning his mind in (a) Jn 11<sup>27</sup>, (b) 11<sup>27</sup> × 12<sup>2</sup>, and (c) 12<sup>21-28</sup>.

(4) As for the time of the day when the occurrence took place, the favoured view is that it was by For (a) night was generally the time of His retirement for prayer (cf. Lk 6<sup>12</sup> with 9<sup>20</sup>; (6) the disciples were 'heavy with sleep, and had to 'keep themselves awake';† and (c) they descended the mountain 'the next day,' i.e. after spending the night on its summit.

On the high land, then, close by Cassres, pomibly in the early dawn, withdrawn a stone's east from the disciples (cf. Lk 2501), communing face to face with the Pather, Christ yielded His heart, wholly preoccupied with self-discovery and tragic anticipation, to the experience of the hour, and received the illumination and strength for which He was ripe. To the disciples it seemed as if a Divine splendour beamed around Him, lighting up the departing darkness, imparting its brightness to His raiment, and suffusing His features with a wondrous lustre, so that He appeared to be transformed. And with it, from within the veil, came, standing forth as men (Lk 9th), the greatest of OT men of God, Moses and Elijah, to talk with Him of His decease (&focos), and to manifest the absorbing interest of the spirit world in His work (cf. 1 P 111) Then, to the overwhelming awe of the three, there drew near a still Greater Presence, for the cloud which now cast its shadow over them all was the cloud of God Himself, and the voice heard was His, proclaiming the Son's high state and attesting His heavenly call.

2. Reality of the occurrence. -The narratives throw upon the mind of the reader the most powerful sense of the reality of the event. Their primary impression is of the outward actuality of the soene. The structure defies dissection, the substance invention. The simple naturalness of the one, the stupendous magnitude of the other, betray no indications of artificiality, while the story as a whole is as inextricably embedded in the surrounding records as the supernatural element in the historical setting of the Gospel itself. It pre sents accordingly a problem to faith and unfaith alike. For the former its substance is too thin,

With the external details of the Transfiguration of Christ, primitive opinion concerned itself but slightly. It dwells on the lact they served to portray—his mapsaly, with the assured conviction of which the whole attitude of the early Churh was animated. Patriatic and mediaval expositors commerch the event with the precision preceding defiung it as the inauguration of His Kinghom, pot anised in its actual working, but in that personal condition of their Lord which should be the rates and signal of its commencement. to carry it further. The Transfiguration is the enthronsment of the Apostolic Christology (Mennes, Karliest Gospel, p. 174). Akin in one respect to the foregoing is the theory of Wimmer and Holtzmann, that we have here Dichtung, truth in a picture. The glorified conception of Christ reached by His followers after His death is transferred to the time of His ministry, and in the picture represented as foretold then. The attractive aspect of these efforts is that they seek to identify the Transfiguration of Christ with a fresh increase of His self realization. The event centres in His Ferson, and for it marks a period. All the foregoing hypotheses prove inadequate in failing to recognize the super terrestrial powers which are represented as appearing, and as communicating a sense of their presence, to the disciples.

The lacuna is filled by Spiritualism, which finds congenial theme in the very facts which rationalism would dissipate. The super-terrestrial is its special delight. It sets forth principles which are alleged to account for the unaccountable features of the light, the visitants, the voice. ence of a 'spiritual body' is asserted, by means of which man may pass out of his ordinary mode of being, of sight and of hearing, into the spiritsphere or unseen world which is everywhere around him, and there be and see and hear, in the unusual conditions subsisting in that sphere, what he never can in this. The notion seems to be that in each man there is a 'spirit,' made of a sort of thin matter, existing within the outward body, but having a purer existence.

Deep within,

Some say, the spirit has another frame,
Invisible, magnetic, beauteous, thin,
And fine as any ether, scent, or fame.

(J. C. Karle, Leght leading unto Light).

In the Transfiguration the 'spiritual body' in Christ abone forth in its native might and spiculous, overpowering the dimness of the fiesh which He had assumed. And by the 'spiritbody' in them, the disciples were enabled to contemplate His and those of Moses and Elijah.
Scanyely so materialistic, yet quite in the same plane of body in them, the disciples were enabled to contemplate it is and those of bloses and Elijah.

Scarcely so materialistic, yet quite in the same plane of thought, are the ideas of the spiritualization and subtlizing of the bodily frame until it became luminous by some inherent law connecting the physical radiance with the riperied image of God in man *(cf e g George Macdonald, Biracter of our Lord, ail.). The error of such theorizing springs from imagining the two as existences of the same kind, and from not realising the two as existences of the same kind, and from not realising the one-prion of spirit as mind or self-cons-leusness, which is the only way of conceiving its actual presence in our world. Spirit exists in the medium of consciousness, not in a peculiar kind of matter. The spiritualization of the natural body is not to be looked for in an astrail or angel-body, but in the centure, dignity, and noble men that make the body of the civileged man the outward image of his soul. When we leave this track we land in vulgar investicing, and 'that way madness item.'

The reality of the Transfiguration may be reason ably maintained on the basis of such considerations as these: -(a) that it primarily displays the state of the inner consciousness of Christ at its height; (b) that it was the direct resultant of the preceding events; and (c) that in the description, on the face of it, there is much that is symbolical. The Transfiguration is the transcript of an exalted apiritual experience, and only in the form of symbol can such be portrayed. To the writers it was the natural mode where their Master was concerned (cf. the Temptation and Christophanies). They were but following illustrious models on which their faith had been nurtured-of Abraham (Gn (ch. 6), of Jeremiah (1<sup>4-10</sup> 20), and above all of Moses (Ex 34<sup>1-10</sup> 21<sup>-20</sup>), of Daniel (ch. 10), and of later Jewish Apocalyptic. The story is written in one mould; it is not manufactured; it tells its truth in words and images that come easily for the purpose, and wed themselves to the truth so freely that it is not possible to divorce them. Material fact and impalpable vision shoot through each other and cannot be dissevered. But this at least is plain, the body t shared in the experiences.

There is no attempt to picture more than has been seen, but it is implied that what has been seen is nothing in comparison with what has been felt. It is the picture of an exalted emotion quickened by the sense of contact with a fact so vast that the spectators are absorbed in contemplation of it. The thought of it cannot be recaptured or recounted, because it is so unexpected, so surreconnect, occasion to its an inexpected, so sur-prising, so new, so unlike all else. Everything is swallowed up in awe and in joy, the joy of feeling face to face with a tremendous experience, an adventure beside which all the glory of the world sinks into insignificance.† Accordingly we find two unique characteristics, the absence of imagination, and the sober insistence on circumstance. Both testify to reality. The fact to which the narrators point transcends experience, and imagination can create nothing which transcends experience. Then, odd as it may seem, the mind in recovering from transcendent wonder and retailing it, continues to regard as impressive details which are really immaterial, but without whose aid the wonder itself would remain hid. Here, then, we have no dream of a fevered twilight, but the fit expression of a mystery, beyond thought and observation, of insight and vision, where the soul is like a dreamer, enthralled by sleep, and struggling with all his might to make some familiar

3. Significance of the Transfiguration.— The inner meaning of the Transfiguration is best brought out by considering it in relation to Christ's Person and Ministry. In relation to His Person it denotes (a) a sublime self-discovery, and (b) a supreme self-dedication. In relation to His Ministry it initiates important departures in the purpose, method, and sphere of His activity.

The event was naturally led up to. We can distinguish the several moments of its development. There was, to begin with, Jesus' gradual enlargement of the Messiah-ideal. Neither Moses nor the prophets satisfied Him. This is one of the most certain results of contemporary NT learning. Jesus claimed to be the Messiah of prophecy, but what the declined the current expectations of Measiah should be. His own thought immensely enriched both the prophetic and the popular forecasts. The Temptation implies that conscionsness. The interval between the Temptation and Transreveals it partly in acts, partly in hints, partly in explicit reserves. At the beginning we see the clear-cut decision; throughout its course the deepening realization of what the decision in-volved: there He is neither simply working, nor aimply instructing. He is also 'manifesting' Him-self. In the life of that Self the lines are complex and interwoven. They include, but are not circumscribed by, those specifically appropriate to the Messianic Hope. His Self is greater. That at the Baptism and the Temptation Christ saw the plenitude of its greatness and the multiplicity of its interior self-relationships is not to be believed. It revealed itself in the living process of His mental and practical powers which it excited to constant energy, and which all radiate from and converge again into it. It is a Self which has its definite stages of progression, whose outward signs are traceable, $ but which finds within the veil of outward seeming its proper home, living there a concurrent life on a higher plane, with peculiar relations to an unseen world, holding power over it, and bringing power from it; and in such wise that men, observing His external attitudes, grew in wonder, debate, belief, or unbelief. His Self grew. Day by day it enlarged its domain, and took on an extraordinary presence of which He was conscious, a secretly luminous life known to Himself, only glimpses of which He could bring within the ken of the disciples.

Nor was this whole process secret from the disciples. We have to note in them a growing perception of the mystery of His life. They began their following of Him with their own mental prepossessions. These He was daily disturbing. Their attention He was continually arresting. The particulars of His life they were driven to scan eagerly from their various points of view, curious concerning it, questioning regarding it, taking sides about it, some slowly rising towards a clear knowledge of the reality, others hardening into the exact reverse. A calm and unimpassioned looking at the material outside manifestation of His Life without any reference to the inward reality of it, was precisely the one thing that did not happen. That it was more than human they divined, but what, how, to what extent the 'more' came in, they could not explain; they were earnestly inquiring. And thus they reached the stage when they could acknowledge His Mossianic proportions: the confession at Cæsarea. That great avowal precipitated the crisis. It was bound to be followed by a further revelation of His purposes. Then came the startling announcement of the Death, opening before their eyes a dark foreground of repudiation and suffering, of whose features Christ Himself, it is probable, could at the moment furnish no clear picture: an announcement whose effect was not mitigated by the further revelation of Resurrection and the coming of the Kingdom. It was a memorable week that followed. The silence of the narrative tells of the intensity of the time. They were on the summits where life absorbs the soul. Thither the juncture of events had brought them. The Master must be lucid.

But first to Himself. A necessary hour is upon Him. Knowing it, He, according to His wont, restrains not the inevitable, but seeks solitude and God. He spends the night in prayer. In the light of His people's destiny, in the face of His prophetic transparence and a prophetic forcements. forerunners, conscious of a deeper need and a more desperate struggle than theirs, He presses His life closer to God's, reaching out after completer sympathy and perfect understanding of His purposes and of His own part in fulfilling them, and receives in return that wonderful and beautiful inflow of life which stirs up unfathomable springs of purity within, and transmutes even His face and form. It was as when in the sunlight, peering into the heart of a gem, we see depth opening beyond depth until it looks as if there were no end to the chambers of splendour that are shut up in the little stone; flake after flake of luminous colour floating up out of the unseen fountain which lies somewhere in its heart. In that high hour Christ knew Himself.

He likewise learned His task. In the same selfrevealing hour the issue of His life was registering itself in the sight of God, who 'seeth the end in the beginning,' and won His approval. The issue was inevitable. For Christ to know God's will was to do it. There was neither doubt nor debate, but immediate decision. He had no instinctive unwillingness like Jeremiah. Rather He resembled Isaiah, who, when he had seen the Majesty of God,' His raising Lazarus 'for the glory of God,' His cure of the blind man 'that the works of God be made manifest,' etc. etc.

Jehovah, came forth from His presence with an awe upon him that never left him, and a force of conviction that never deserted him, and with the feeling of an imperative necessity lying on him to speak His word to men which he could not resist. So Christ. He had seen His own glory and felt its power in Him, and was uplifted with a radiant energy before which, as it seemed, no wickedness could stand, and which inspired with a joy deep and strong and solemn. The sweet and awful gladness of His consecration fills His heart and shines out in His face. The Transfiguration was the Divine defiance of the coming darkness (cf.

2 Co 46).*
The Transfiguration event transformed His mind: it transformed also His ministry. Its fascination was upon Him, impelling Him to make it manifest with a certain eager wistfulness. The motive is not: Death is before Me, the sooner it is over the better; but, The beauty of the Father's face has risen upon Me, let it shine out into the hearts of men, and draw all men unto it.

The endeavour to bring this home to the disciples now dominates His thought and directs His activity, dividing both from His Galilæan teaching and work by the clearest line of demarcation. Themes original to the Law and the Prophets yield to the 'excellent glory' of the Cross, and the nature of the Kingdom His death would introduce. Miraclest and parables cease as an integral part of His ministry. Public addresses, which hitherto had been the rule, are now limited, so far as we read, to the Temple courts and the Sanhedrin; their place is taken by more private converse. There is a less obvious calling of attention to Himself, in view of a keener anxiety to concentrate attention on the Spirit that animates Himself and the Father, and is needful for that higher form of fellowship of men with God than Israel had known. which He Himself enjoyed, and which He promises will glorify them as it had glorified Him.‡ From this last consideration we deduce the significance of the event for us. It is the same as for Christ and His disciples. 'We shall be like him,' says the disciple who had felt most effectually the power of His personal presence (1 Jn 3<sup>2</sup>).

That points to an organic change that will take place in us at His coming. It has to be taken in conjunction with this other, 'Christ in you the hope of glory' (Col 127). The moral transformation is the root and beginning of the organic. Christ not only so acts upon us as to conform us to His holy and exalted pattern now; when He comes again, it shall be to reflect His glory into the persons of His believing followers. The Church of the redeemed will mirror His surpassing loveliness and majesty, 'He shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be marvelled at in all them that believe'  $(2 \text{ Th } 1^{10})$ .

interprets the Transfiguration as designed solely to inspire and comfort Christ in prospect of His approaching Sufferings by providing an anticipation of the glory of the Resurrection (Yath of the Gospel, p. 194) thinks the Transfiguration an opening of the door of heaven for a splendid departure, His earthly probation being now ended. An ingenious writer in the Church Quarterly Review (July 1901, 'A Study of our Lord') draws out these parallels:—transfiguration of body in face of maltreatment of body, appearance of Elijah and Moses in face of the hiding of the Father's face. Such exegesis is exaggeration and misses proportion.

TRANSMIGRATION.—The idea of the pre-existence of the human soul seems to be assumed in the question which the disciples put to Jesus with reference to the man born blind (Jn 9°). The pre-existence hinted at is presumably and at first glance an incarnated one, for it is possible to sin in it. But if this exegesis of the passage be correct, then, at least in the minds of the disciples who propounded the cuestion there was a detained who propounded the question, there was a doctrine of transmigration. In order to ascertain the correctness of the exegesis, it is necessary to look into the antecedents and broad setting of the

The doctrine of transmigration, i.e. the idea that when the soul leaves the body at death it passes into another body, was held widely among the Egyptians, the Hindus, and the Greeks. Each one of these peoples, however, developed it in a peculiar form of its own. Through the long history represented by their combined life, it assumed a large variety of aspects. Broadly speaking, these may be reduced to two, the cruder and the more refined metempsychosis.

(a) In the crudest form, belief in transmigration was simply the belief that the moving principle of a living being, either immediately upon the death of that being or after a more or less prolonged interval, takes upon itself another organism. In this form of it, the doctrine does not distinguish between human bodies and bodies of other living beings; or, to be more precise, of other material forms reputed to be living. The soul is supposed to pass into another organism of the same class, or of a higher or a lower class. A man might be reborn as a brute, or as a tree or stream, or even as a star. The ethical idea associated with this form of metempsychosis is in the belief that the kind of body taken by the soul depends on its realizing or failing to realize ethical ideals. Of this form of the doctrine, it is quite safe to say, there is not the slightest trace either in the NT or in the whole range of Hebrew literature, with its sequel of Jewish Rabbinical teaching of the earlier period. If it appear at all in Jewish thought, it does so as an importation in a much later stage than the Biblical.

(b) The more refined form of the doctrine of transmigration limits the sphere of movement to the human race. The human soul or personality is, according to this conception, capable of re-appearing and taking part in the world. In the strictest sense of the word this is, of course, not transmigration, but reincarnation. But whatever it may be called, there are a number of expressions in the Gospels which point to the existence of the belief in the time of Jesus. Chief and foremost among these are the passages which refer to John the Baptist (Mt 114 1712 13, Mk 913). Here the disciples are puzzled by the apparent inconsistency between the fact that Jesus is the Messiah and the fact that Elijah has not appeared, as, in accordance with an authoritative interpretation of the prophecy of Malachi (4), he was expected, to precede and prepare the way for the Messiah. The disciples evidently accepted the teaching of the scribes. This belief, however, does not put it beyond doubt that the doctrine of transmigration or even reincarnation was current. Elijah had not died and been divested of his first body. His reappearance could only be conceived of as involving his descent from heaven with the same body which he took there at the time of his ascen-sion. The difficulty in believing that John the Baptist was Elijah consisted, at least in part, in the fact that he was known to have had a natural birth; whereas the return of Elijah would necessarily exclude such birth. Jesus' answer to the disciples simply removes the case from the physical into the spiritual sphere, and thus makes the question before their minds an irrelevant one. The prophecy had been fulfilled, but its fulfilment involved neither the reincarnation of Elijah nor his descent from heaven with his first body.

Another instance of belief which might be mistaken for transmigration is that suggested in Herod's words (Mt 14th) identifying Jesus with John the Baptist. But here, too, the words scarcely point to belief in transmigration. All that is necessary to assume is that the remorse-stricken Herod saw in the miracles reported of Jesus that John the Baptist had risen from the dead. It is belief in resurrection rather than in Still another case is that in which the disciples, in answer to the question of Jesus, report that some believed Him to be Elijah, others Jeremiah, and others one of the prophets (Mt 1614, Mk 614-17). The idea of transmigration is more natural in this passage, but even here it is not clearly set forth. As far as Jesus is concerned, it is certainly not only not held or encouraged by Him, but quite definitely set aside. At most, it can be only an idea entertained by the common people.

Outside of the Gospels, the traces that a belief in metempsychosis was held in Palestine at the time of Jesus are very scanty. It appears that among the Essenes it was held that the soul was immortal, and its life upon earth due to its being drawn from its native ether and entangled in the body as in a prison cell (Jos. BJ II. viii. 11). The affinity of this belief with the Platonic teaching regarding the nature and origin of the soul suggests that the Platonic idea of transmigration, as its inevitable logical corollary, was held also by the Essenes.

In general, there was nothing in the nature of Jewish thought to prevent the adoption of the idea of transmigration as soon as the distinction between soul and body supplanted the older idea of the unitary character of the human being. On the contrary, there was very much to make the thought welcome in the Rabbinical system. The thought welcome in the Rabbinical system. The doctrine of pre-existence (of the Messiah, of the Torah, of the Tabernacle) would easily lend itself as a basis for the idea of the pre-existence in some form or other of human souls. Further, belief in the possession of the body by more than one spiritual being (demoniac possession) would tend to prepare the way for the belief in the return of disembodied spirits into human bodies. Finally, the idea of the property of the belief in the return of the state of the st the idea of resurrection from the dead furnished an analogue to reincorrection. an analogue to reincarnation. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if the notion should appear more or less clearly in the later Rabbinical the-ology (cf. Epiphanius Wilson, The Talmud, Pre-face). The question of its existence in the days of Jesus Christ must be left open, while the question of its being entertained by Him or taught in the Gospels must be answered in the negative.

A. C. ZENOS. TRAVEL.—Travelling for pleasure was almost, if not altogether, unknown in the ancient world. This is to be accounted for by lack of roads, lack of conveyances, and perils by the way. Travellers had usually some definite object in view; Abraham seeking for a home at the command of Jehovah (Gn  $12^{in}$ ); Jacob fleeing from his brother (Gn  $28^{10}$ ); the Israelites going up to their sacred places, and later to the Temple at Jerusalem. As the sea had special terrors, travelling was chiefly by land, and not till well on in history did men launch boldly out into the deep. In the days of the Empire, sailing was confined to certain well defined tracks, and to certain seasons. On land, travel was done for the most part on foot; hence the custom of washing the feet (Gn 184, Jg 1921 etc.) was almost a necessity as a token of hospitality. Horses were used for war, and camels for the desert. Persons of rank rode on mules (2 S 13<sup>29</sup>, 1 K 1<sup>23</sup>), while the ass was more usually kept as a beast of burden. Wheeled waggons were not in general use, and, on the rare occasions on which they were employed, were heavy, cumbersome, and without springs. Joseph sent waggons for his father (Gn 45<sup>19, 21</sup>); the kings of Israel had their chariots (1 K 22<sup>25</sup>); and the Ethiopian eunuch made his journey to Jerusalem in a chariot (Ac 8<sup>26</sup>); but wheeled vehicles of any kind were rare. I.ong journeys were generally undertaken in the summer, when the roads were good and firm. In the winter the roads were soft, and other conditions unfavourable. In Mt 24<sup>20</sup> Jesus says, 'Pray that your flight be not in the winter time,' which means the rainy season, when roads are practically impassable, and food difficult to obtain en route. This accounts for St. Paul's desire to have Timothy with him before the winter set in (2 Ti 4<sup>21</sup>). In the morning the traveller started on his journey and continued it till were good and firm. In the winter the roads were veller started on his journey, and continued it till noon-day, when he took refuge for an hour or two under some kindly shade from the scorching rays of the sun, and then resumed his course (Ca 1'). To refuse hospitality to a traveller was a breach of good manners, if not, indeed, an insult to God. This state of affairs continues largely in Palestine to-day, though on the tourist routes the people have fallen in with the spirit of the age.

The ordinary way of reckoning the length of a journey was not by miles, but by time (Gn 30% בין אָרָהָ, Jon 34 בין אָרָהָ, Lk 244 אָעּבּיְהָה זֹסׁסֹסֹּי, and this makes it difficult to determine accurately the distances covered. Moses asked that the children of Israel should be permitted to go into the wilderness a three days' journey (Ex 5<sup>3</sup>), and in Gn 31<sup>23</sup> it is said that Laban pursued after Jacob a seven days' journey. There would be a great difference between the speed of these two companies, and consequently in the ground traversed. In hilly districts the progress would be less than in the flat country, and a small company or a single individual would go faster than a caravan. An ordinary day's journey might be put down at about 20 miles, but it would require an extraordinary stretch of imagination to make that fit in with Nu 11<sup>31</sup>. In Lk 2<sup>44</sup> it probably meant not more than 6 miles, for these festal caravans, with their crowds, moved at a leisurely pace; and tradition has it that the halting-place was Beeroth, which is 6 miles north of Jerusalem.

The longest the inverse than the strength of the stren

The longer the journey the slower the pace, for provision for man and beast and equipment for the way had to be carried. 'Take victuals with you for the journey' (Jos 9<sup>11</sup>) was the rule and not the exception. This led Christ to say to the

Twelve, when He sent them out, 'Provide neither gold nor silver for your journey' (Mt 10<sup>9.10</sup> ||), so that they might not be hampered by these things, and that they might receive a much-needed lesson in faith.

Reference is made in Ac 112 to a Sabbath day's journey (σαββάτου δδδς). This is the only place where the phrase occurs. Olivet is said to be a Sabbath day's journey from Jerusalem. The expression is very indefinite. Josephus in one place

(Ant. XX. viii. 6) gives the distance from Jerusalem to the Mount of Olives as 5 furlongs, and in another as 6 (BJ v. ii. 3). Schleusner makes it 7½ stadia or furlongs. The difference seems to lie in the varying length of the cubit, which in the older Hebrew measurement was longer than in the later. measurement was longer than in the latter. The result is the same—2000 cubits, which would bring it into conformity with Rabbinical law, 'Let no man go walking from his place beyond 2000 ells on the seventh day' (Jerus. Targ. on Ex 16<sup>29</sup>). A Sabbath day's journey was by common consent 2000 cubits or ells, though some Rabbis allowed a kind of sliding scale, and spoke of the greater journey (2800), the medium (2000), and the smaller (1800). This was purely Rabbinical, and deduced from (1) Ex 16<sup>29</sup> 'Abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh day'; (2) from the distance between the Ark and the people on the march (Jos 34); and (3) from the conditions laid down as to the cities of refuge (Nu 35°). In Ex 16°2 the 'place' by a process of Rabbinical reasoning became the city where a man dwelt; and it was argued that 'if one who committed murder accidentally was allowed to take this journey of 2000 ells on the Sabbath day without violating the sanctity of the day, innocent people might do the same.' By a little ingenuity a Sabbath day's journey could be considerably extended. If a person desired to do so, he had simply to carry to some point within the Sabbatical limit two meals before the Sabbath began, one of which he had to eat and the other to bury; and that place became for him his dwelling-place. is even alleged that by fixing his eye upon a tree or wall within the prescribed limit, and uttering certain words, he could make that his startingpoint.

In NT times it was customary, as indeed it is to-day, to accompany a departing guest on a part of his way (Ro 15<sup>24</sup>, Ac 15<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 16<sup>6</sup>) as a token of goodwill and affection.

TREASURE.—The word 'treasure' upon the lips of a Hebrew signifies a store of anything that constitutes wealth—of corn and wine and oil, as well as of gold and silver and precious stones (Mt 13°2). Hence spiritually the word suggests an apt figure of the true eternal riches. Just as on earth the worldly-wise may lay up stores of wealth, so in the heavens the man who seeks after spiritual things may lay up for himself an eternal treasure. It has been imagined by some commentators that by 'treasure in heaven' our Lord means merely the reward which shall be given hereafter to all who suffer loss for His sake on earth. 'Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven' (Mt 1921, Mk 1021, Lk 18<sup>22</sup>), they take to mean merely, 'Give away thine earthly wealth, and God shall give thee instead heavenly blessedness'; but so to interpret the words is to miss by far the most valuable part of their teaching. It was this interpretation that formed the chief justification for the monkish asceticism of the Middle Ages. It gave rise to a false spiritualism, to the fatal and irreconcilable dualism of sacred and secular. In addressing the words to the rich young man, our Lord was treating a particular case, the case of one whose spiritual aspirations were crushed beneath the burden of his wealth. The treasure in heaven which Christ told him he should have was not to be gained by the simple process of denuding him-self of his worldly possessions — God would not step in to supply in the next world what he had voluntarily sacrificed in this. Such teaching would have been an appeal to selfish prudence merely, would justify, if it were correct, all that unbelievers have said about the selfishness of Christianity. It was not to the man's selfishness that Christ addressed Himself, but to the earnest longing after righteousness which He perceived in him. 'What lack I yet?' the man had said, even after asserting that he had kept the commandments from his youth up. Christ therefore bade him cast aside the temptation which bound him down, that his aspirations might at last have free play; that, untrammelled by earthly cares, he might take to himself the treasure of righteousness and truth which he had always longed to make his own.

That spiritual treasure is regarded by our Lord as a personal thing, not as a mere reward assigned from without, is rendered even more plain by what He says regarding the 'treasure of the heart' (Mt 12<sup>50</sup> || Lk 6<sup>50</sup>). This treasure of the heart is manifestly the accumulated tendencies which we call character, the habits which a man makes, the qualities which he acquires, by the repeated choices of his life. He who strives continuously to follow the dictates of righteousness and love, makes for himself a righteous and loving character. His past deeds become a store from which he can continually draw anew. The more good deeds he does the richer grows his heart in goodness, and the greater will his joy become in doing what is right. His heart will of itself bear fruit of goodness. But the same is true also of the evil man. The second lie is proverbially easier than the first. The more evil he does, the more evil grows his heart, until it is well-nigh impossible for it to produce what is good. His heart becomes callous and hard, so that he can no longer take delight in goodness. Thus, again, it is true that 'where the treasure is, there will the heart be also.' The heart of the good man brings down heaven to earth, while that of the evil man could find no bliss in heaven itself.

When in Col  $2^8$  St. Paul tells his readers that in Christ are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, he is but following out the same figure.  $\ell\nu$   $X\mu\omega\tau\phi$  expresses one of the two great principles of the Pauline theology. To win the true treasure a man must be in Christ; for He is the universal Man, the ideal of manhood, the only perfectly loving and wise and true of all mankind. In Him only was the heavenly treasure revealed in perfect fulness. He who would share it must therefore be in Christ, must be inspired by His spirit.

The true treasure of the human heart is the Kingdom of heaven. To have the Kingdom of God within one, is to be spiritually rich indeed. In setting forth the manner in which the Kingdom is received into different kinds of hearts, our Lord once again uses the figure of treasure, in the parable of the Treasure hid in a field (Mt 13<sup>44</sup>). Here He refers to an experience not uncommon in the East, where the uncertain tenure of property led men often to hide their wealth, and where the equal uncertainty of life caused it often to remain unclaimed. This and the parable of the Pearl of Great Price (another kind of treasure), which follows it, describe the two ways in which the truth of the gospel is received by men. There is the finder who has never sought at all, and who comes upon his find by accident; and there is the finder who has spent his life in seeking. In this, however, they are like, that when the treasure is discovered each is willing to part with all he has for its possession. Indeed, this willingness is the test of the true finder; but it is also the essential mark of the true treasure. It is of such a nature that it cannot be possessed for less than all that a man is and has. It lays hold upon the true finder's heart; for in it he recognizes the satisfaction of all his longings: it is the completion of his being, the source of his life to all eternity.

TREASURY.—Two words are  $tr^{d}$ . 'treasury' in the Gospels. 1. γαζοφυλάκιον (fr. γάζα, a word of Persian origin =  $\theta\eta\sigma\alpha\nu\rho\delta\tau$ , 'treasure,' and  $\phi\nu\lambda\alpha\kappa\dot{\eta}$ , 'guard'), 'a place for keeping treasure,' i.e. either a treasure-chest or a treasure-chamber (Mk 12<sup>41</sup> 48 Lk 21<sup>1</sup>, Jn 8<sup>20</sup>). (1) In the two Synoptic passages it is used, in connexion with the incident of the poor widow who gave her two mites, to denote a treasure-chest, or receptacle into which offerings were cast by worshippers coming into the Temple—a sense in which the word is found also in Josephus (Ant. XIX. vi. 1, where Agrippa hangs his chain of gold ὑπὲρ τὸ γαζοφυλάκιον). According to the Talmud (Sheqalim, vi. 5), there stood in the court of the women, the most frequented part of the sacred enclosure, 13 brazen chests, into which were dropped the contributions made for the service of the Temple, the support of the poor, and other pious purposes. These chests were of a peculiar shape—bulging out beneath so as to be of considerable capacity, but tapering upwards to a narrow mouth, into which the offerings were put—and, because of their resemblance to inverted trumpets, were known as shōphārōth (h)τριπ, 'trumpets'). It was into one of these shōphārōth that the widow would cast her all. (2) In the EV rendering of Jn 8<sup>20</sup> Jesus is said to have spoken 'in the treasury' (ἐν τῷ γαζοφολακίψ), as He taught in the Temple. This rendering would imply that the γαζοφυλάκιον in question was not a treasure-chest merely, but a part of the Temple itself in which treasure was Now, we know that there were special treasure-chambers within the inner court, in which not only the precious vessels of the sacrificial service and the costly garments of the priests, but vast sums of money and various other valuables were kept, and that these treasure-chambers, which were under the charge of officers known as γαζοφύλακες, were called γαζοφύλακα (Neh 10<sup>57</sup> LXX; Jos. BJ vi. v. 2). That Jesus would be found teaching in one of these inner treasure-chambers is, however, exceedingly improbable. And when we put such a supposition aside, two views may be taken of the meaning of  $\dot{\epsilon} \nu \tau \hat{\varphi} \gamma a \zeta \phi \nu \lambda a \kappa i \varphi$ . (a) We may take γαζοφυλάκιον to denote, as in the Synoptics, nothing more than a treasure-chest, and understand έν to be used in the sense of proximity merely (so Meyer; cf. ἐν δεξιὰ θεοῦ [Ro 8³4 and frequently], 'at the right hand of God'), so that the phrase would signify 'at or near the treasury.' (b) We may take ἐν in its strict local sense (so Winer, Grum. of NT Gr. 481), and then understand γαζοφυλάκιον to denote that part of the Women's Court in which the treasurechests were kept. But in either case the general meaning will be the same. Jesus was not in some closely guarded chamber of the inner Temple, but sitting 'near the shūphārūth,' or 'in the colonnade where the shopharoth stood.'

2. κορβανας (fr. κορβαν; see CORBAN) occurs in NT only in Mt 276, where it denotes the sacred treasury of the Temple. Into this treasury the chief priests would not put Judas' thirty pieces of silver, 'because it is the price of blood.' In Josephus (BJ II. ix. 4) the word is used not of the Temple treasury, but of the treasures it contained. Herod is said to have created a disturbance in Jerusalem by expending upon aqueducts 'that sacred treasure which is called corbanas' (τὸν ἰερὸν θησαυρὸν, καλείται δὲ κορβανᾶς).

It may be added that, although in EV θησαυρός is invariably rendered 'treasure,' it is occasionally used in a sense that corresponds to 'treasury' or the place where treasure is kept. In Mt 12 lb || Lk 645 it denotes the treasury of the heart; in Mt 125° | Lk 645 the treasury of the heart; in Mt 135° that of the well-provided householder, to whom Jesus likens the 'scribe who hath been made a disciple to the kingdom of heaven.'

TREE (ξύλον, Lat. lignum, arbor).—A poetic name for the Cross (Ac 5<sup>20</sup> 10<sup>20</sup> 13<sup>20</sup>, 1 P 2<sup>24</sup>; cf. Gal 3<sup>13</sup>; nowhere in Gospels). The name no doubt originated in the practice (cf. Jos 10<sup>20</sup>) of employing a tree in case of haste for the purpose of crucifixion * (cf. gallows-tree), but in mediæval times it was explained by a quaint legend. As he lay a dying, it was said, Adam sent his son Seth to the angel that guarded Paradise, to crave a bough from the tree of life. The angel gave it, and Seth carried it to his father, but found him dead. He planted the bough upon his grave. In course of time, when Solomon was building the Temple, the tree was cut down, but it refused to be fitted into any part of the Temple, and was placed over a stream to serve as a bridge. By and by the queen of Sheba came with her gifts and offerings. Seeing the tree she would not walk over it, since she recognized that the Redeemer of the world would suffer on it. Long afterwards the Jews took it and cast it into a stagnant pool, which derived a miraculous virtue from its presence: an angel descended from time to time and troubled the water, and the first that stepped in after the troubling was healed (cf. [Jn] 54). There it remained until the time of our Lord's Passion, when it was taken out of the pool and fashioned into the Cross on which He suffered.†

Much devout fancy was inspired by the term.

It suggested a reference to the Cross in Ca 2<sup>3.5</sup>, which runs thus in the Vulgate: 'Sicut malus inter ligna silvarum, sic dilectus meus inter filios. Sub umbra illius, quem desideraveram, sedi: et fructus ejus dulcis gutturi meo. Fulcite me flori-bus, stipate me malis: quia amore langueo.' The hymn-writers extolled the 'arbor salutifera' which bore such sweet and precious fruit. One says : ‡

Fertilitate potens, O dulce et nobile lignum, Quando tuis ramis tam nova poma geris.

And in his exquisite Laudismus de S. Cruce St. Bonaventura says: §

'Crux est arbor decorata, Christi sanguine sacrata, Cunctis plena fructibus; Quibus anima eruuntur, Cum supernis nutriuntur Cibis in cœlestibus.'

The Fathers loved to contrast the first tree whose fruit brought death into the world, and the second tree whose 'leaves are for the healing of the nations' (Rev 222). Cf. St. Jerome on Mk 15<sup>22</sup> 'Hic figitur salus in ligno, ligno primo infixa est mors. Lignum primum lignum scientiæ boni et mali est. Et secundum lignum boni tantum nobis et vitæ lignum est.' In Evangel. Nicodem. xxiii., after the 'harrying of hell' Hades says to Satan: 'All that thou gainedst by the tree of knowledge (διὰ τοῦ ξύλου τοῦ σταυροῦ) thou hast lost.' See also art. CROSS TRIAL OF JESUS .- The narratives of what may be termed, for the sake of convenience, the two-fold trial of Jesus yield a record of the proceed-ings which is fairly intelligible and substantially authentic, but which is bound up with a triple set of problems. Some of these are topographical or archæological; some are legal, connected with the jurisprudence of the trial; while others are historical, arising from the literary criticism of the Evangelic traditions. The fragmentariness of these traditions * and the lack of any outside testimony occasionally prevent criticism from throwing a steady ray of light upon the exact course of affairs, and this is particularly the case with regard to the first two classes of the trial-problems.

1. The topographical problem.—This includes the question of Pilate's Practorium (see vol. i. p. 859, and PRETORIUM), the precise meaning of Gabbatha (Jn 1913, cf. GABBATHA and PAVEMENT), the problem whether Annas and Caiaphas had separate residences or stayed together in an official house, and the site of the meeting-place of the Sanhedrin (in the house of Caiaphas or elsewhere). These details are discussed elsewhere in this Dictionary, and it is unnecessary to examine them afresh, particularly as the decisive evidence, such as it is, has to be drawn as a rule from considerations which lie outside the words of the Gospels. The same remark applies, though in a less degree,

2. The legal problem.—The question whether Jesus was legally condemned to death starts an interesting problem in historical jurisprudence, but it was not present to the minds of the Evangelists or of the original reporters of the Passion; and this, combined with the condensed, fragmentary, and even discrepant character of their traditions, renders it extremely difficult to answer the question with any confidence in the affirmative or the negative. If the Talmudic law was in force in Palestine during the lifetime of Jesus, there would be no course open but to agree with some savants of last century that the Sanhedrin acted illegally. But the Talmud represents a much later phase of Jewish jurisprudence, and it is probable that, viewed in the light of contemporary practice, the Council were careful on the whole to observe the letter, though not the spirit, of justice, and to practise most of the forms of legality. Thus it is far from certain that they met formally at night, though it seems as if they passed their resolution before daybreak; and the main counts against them are the neglect to warn the witnesses solemnly before giving evidence, the judicial use of the prisoner's confession, and the undue haste with which the proceedings were rushed through. They were kept within judicial limits only so far as it was necessary to save appearances.

The proceedings before Pilate are less obscure. It was necessary for the Jewish authorities to obtain the governor's sanction for the execution of the death sentence, and this involved a fresh trial of the accused. Pilate seems to have acquitted

† Thus the ablest of recent jurists who have discussed the problem, Mr. A. Taylor Innes, sums up his inquiry in the words: 'A process, begun, continued, and apparently finished in the course of one night, commencing with witnesses against the accused who were sought for by the judges, but whose evidence was not sustained even by them; continuing by interrogations which Hebrew law does not sanction; and ending with a demand for confession which its doctors expressly forbid; all followed, twenty-four hours too soon, by a sentence which described a claim to be the fulfiller of the hopes of Israel as blasphemy—such a process had neither the form nor the fairness of a judicial trial.' This needs to be qualified, but substantially it seems accurate.

Jesus of the majestas or high treason which the Council first brought forward against Him, there is some doubt as to whether the acquittal was formally pronounced in accordance with law. In the Markan tradition, followed by Matthew, Pilate never pronounces Jesus to be innocent, al though it is plain that he did not believe Him to be guilty. His reason for allowing Him to be crucified is a desire to curry favour with the people. When he discovers that they prefer Barabbas to Jesus, and that the latter is not after all a popular infatuated leader, he has little or no scruples about handing Him over to the tender mercies of His com-His blood be on their heads?

The Lukan tradition, followed substantially in the Fourth Gospel, raises the problem of jurisprudence definitely by affirming that Pilate thrice pronounced Jesus innocent (234-14-22). If so, the first acquittal makes the reference of Jeaus to Herod illegal. But, as we shall see, it is probable that this formal verdict is at least antedated, and that Jesus was not finally acquitted, if He was acquitted at all, until He had been sent back from Herod. Thereafter the proceedings are destitute of justice; Pilate is concerned not with his legal duty, but with the interests of his personal safety and popularity, which were endangered by his con-scientious desire to release the prisoner.

Only a critical analysis and comparison of the early Christian traditions can yield evidence for estimating aright the problems of the jurisprudence of the trials, and even the results of such an inquiry are not final, especially in the case of the Jewish trial. It is with a preliminary caution of this kind that we enter on the third and most important stage of our discussion.

3. The historical problem. The confusing and even conflicting features in the narratives of the trial of Jesus, which followed Historical ARREST and BETRAYAL), are due to the fact that no uniform or complete account of it was ever circulated among the early Christians. The Gospels betray different currents of tradition, and these currents do not always flow in the same channel. Here and there, in different circles, different phases or reminiscences of the trial were preserved, but not even in the Markan narrative, with its Petrine basis, does an exhaustive, accurate record of the proceedings lie embedded. The later Gospels treat the account in their own way, omitting, adapting, and adding to suit their own religious interests, and one of the tasks of criticism is to determine how far these may preserve some authentic traits, for it is as erroneous to presuppose that all later additions to the Markan outline are unhistorical as to assume that the details of the four canonical stories can be harmonized into a protocol of the actual proceedings.

To receive the due religious impression of the Evangelic narratives, it is generally enough to read each by itself. But while devout feeling read each by uson. This make seventes, such is seldon perturbed by any discrepancies, such differences do exist both in conception and in detail, and the juxtaposition of the four Gospels in the canon obliges faith to look at the variety of the records and make some attempt at a historical estimate of their relative contents. The main business is to appreciate their religious interests Yet, whilst these are both obvious and independent of critical research, a comparative injury into the different traditions is imperative. 'Investigations of this kind, which attempt to weigh the merits of conflicting or parallel accounts, have always a somewhat cold blooded and judical spirit in them, a spirit which cannot but be out of harmony with that in which we can study the Passion of our Lord to our soul's profit. Yet these bestored questions must be faced, if our estimate of the gospel is to be lifted out of the region of mere in-herited sentiment.' Fortunately, verbal accuracy is not equivalent to inner verselly The occasional divergences of the records do not affect scriously either the religious truth or the historical value of the traditions as a whole

The primary fact which emerges from such a study is that when Jesus was brought before the Jewish authorities,* He was judged worthy of death, and thereupon remitted to Pilate. But was He really tried? and if so, before what authorities? and of what specific charge was He found guilty? These questions cannot be answered off-hand. Still less can any one Gospel be assumed to be the standard by which the others are to be measured. An examination of all four is necessary, if the problems are even to be stated, much less solved.

(a) Jesus before the Jewish authorities (Mk 14<sup>53-65</sup> = Mt 26<sup>57-65</sup> = Lk 22<sup>54-71</sup>).—The arrest of Jesus, all the Gospels agree, was at once followed by His removal to the palace of the high priest in custody of the guard. What occurred between this and the crucifixion on the following day is usually described as the trial of Jesus, but a glance at the order of affairs will soon show that it is extremely doubtful if Jesus really was ever tried, in the strict sense of the term. Pilate made an attempt to try Him, yet we cannot be sure if it was carried out adequately. He gave his general impressions of the prisoner, asked a few questions of Him and His accusers, and strove to avoid a decision. A rough and honest informality marked the opening stages, at least, of the intercourse between the Roman governor and the Galikean prisoner. Latterly, Pilate failed to recognize any rights on the part of Jesus. When he gave Him up to be crucified, it was against his better judgment, and in ratification of a previous sentence pronounced by the Jewish Council. Even here, as we shall see, it is questionable if all the legal forms were observed.

According to one tradition, the Jewish trial took place at once in the house of Caiaphas, where the Sanhedrin had gathered, despite the lateness of the Sanhedrin had gathered, despite the lateness of the hour. Not a moment was lost. The arrest was followed by the examination. Then, after being found guilty of blasphemy, Jesus was kept waiting till morning, and exposed meanwhile to the coarse mockery and rough play of the company (probably, for the most part, the servants of the high priest and the rest of the underlings). At daybreak an adjourned meeting was held, at which He was formally bound (the sentence perhaps being ratified) and handed over to Pilate's jurisdiction.

The Lukan tradition defers the examination till

The Lukan tradition defers the examination till the morning. After His arrest, Jesus was detained in custody in the house of the high priest, and, in the absence of the judicial authorities, suffered violence at the hands of His captors. Then, at daybreak, the Sanhedrin was hastily convened. An abbreviated account of its proceedings is given, in which all reference to false witnesses and the charge about the Temple is omitted, but the end is the same. Jesus is found guilty, and taken away to Pilate.

The latter tradition is more true to the regular practice of the Sanhedrin, which met by day; for practice of the Sanhedrin, which met by day; for * St. Paul sometimes makes the whole nation (1 Th 214 15), sometimes the rulers especially (cf. Ac 1327.29), responsible for the crime, and once he ascribes it to demonic impulse (1 Co 28).

St. Peter, in Ac 3137. also blames the Jerusalemites, rather than Pilate, whom from the first the Evangelic tradition rightly regarded as less culpable. But even within the circle of the canonical Gospels it is possible to trace the beginnings of that tendency to compare Pilate favourably with the Jews, which afterwards went to quite extravagant lengths.

† Chwolson, in the appendix to his Das lette Passamahl Christi, argues that the illegal haste of the proceedings was due to the fact that the Sadducees, who were adherents of the Roman government, were in power at the time. Their antipathy to one whose teaching threatened their class privileges in the Temple and the political status quo of the nation, led them to breaches of the law which would have been less probable in the case of the Pharisees. Derenbourg in his Essas sur L'Histoire et la Géographie de la Palestin (1867), p. 201, had already urged this view. He explained the precipitate conduct of the proceedings as impossible for Pharisees, and due to the well-know severity of the Boethusians. Rabbi Ziegler (in Der Kampf zwischen Judentum und Christentum, 1907, p. 34 f.) fixes the blame upon the Herodians.

only then were its decisions valid (cf. SANHEDRIN). But this does not necessarily prove that it is more original, for St. Luke may have been smoothing out what appeared to him an irregularity in the previous tradition. Upon the other hand, the difficulties involved by the Markan view are serious. Once Jesus was in their hands, the authorities had nothing to gain by rushing through the trial before morning. It would be in their own interests to preserve most of the forms of legal process; and it is difficult to think of the Council, or even a quorum of twenty-three members, being already summoned hurriedly to await the nocturnal arrest of Jesus, when nothing decisive could be done for hours.

The probability is, therefore, that while, no doubt, Caiaphas, Annas, and some others were on the spot, the Council was not formally convened until the early morning, about 6 a.m., and that Jesus spent the night in custody. Even the Markan tradition includes a morning examination (Mk 151=Mt 271, a full and formal meeting of the court), which, after the nocturnal one, would be no more than a closing deliberation or a hasty ratification of the sentence already passed. The colourless and brief mention of this second examination shows that the Petrine tradition had no exact knowledge of its proceedings. In reality, it had no room for it, and its preservation is due simply to the fact that the morning trial, which St. Luke has described, was too firmly established in the primitive record to be entirely ignored even when it was deprived of its proper point. As to the reasons which led the Markan tradition to dilate on a nocturnal trial, the clue is probably to be found in the fact that there really was such a hasty preliminary cross-questioning of Jesus; only, it was not before Caiaphas, but before Annas (see Annas), the influential ex-high priest, who had been at the bottom of the whole movement to arrest Jesus. The prisoner was taken illegally and informally before him, questioned about His disciples and His teaching,* and then removed to the house of Caiaphas, where the proceedings eventually took place which are recorded by Mark and Matthew.

place which are recorded by Mark and Matthew.

The fact that this preliminary examination or ***** sees** before Annas is recorded only in the Fourth Gospel (1812-14-19-31) has excited, not unnaturally, strong suspicion of its authenticity, and efforts, more or less plausible (cf. Keim, vi. 38 f.), have been made to show that the author has wrongly inferred from Ik 33, Ac 46 517, the high authority of Annas; and that the latter is brought in for the sake of novelty or variety. These efforts are quite unconvincing. Historical criticism cannot be put off nowadays with the assumption that the Markan tradition is so exhaustive and infallible as to prove a standard for judging the later Gospels. Certain data in the tradition even of the Fourth Gospel (c.g. the date of the Crucifixion, cf. vol. i. 413 f., 882 f., with Kattenbusch in Die Christliche Welt, 1895, pp. 317 f., 331 f.) are winning more and more credence from critics of all schools, and the insupersable difficulty about eliminating the Annas trial is the impossibility of detecting any adequate motive for its invention and introduction. The various theories which explain its growth from a missonception of the Synoptists will not hold water. The details of it are also uncoloured by any specific Johannine interest.† It is not shot through, as is the later trial before * Jesus ignores the query with regard to the disciples (which involved an insinuation of sedition and conspiracy), and asserts that His teaching was open and above-board, no esoteric doctrine. The well-known parallel is the remark of Socrates in the Apologia (xxl.): 'If any one says he ever learnt or heard from me in private what all other people did not hear, be sure he is not speaking the truth.' Twice only, here and in Mk 14%, does He expostulate with the priestly authorities for their unfair treatment of Him. Evidently He saw that they were determined to have their way, and no further protest fell from His lips (see vol. i. 758-757). The blow of Jn 1822 is illustrated by that of Ac 232. It is arbitrary to take the latter as the prototype of the former.

† The historical basis of the report is recognized not merely by Ewald, Renan, and Hausrath, but by so thoroughgoing a critic as A. Réville (Jésus de Nazareth, ii. 3781.). The likelihood is that it forms, as Oscar Holtzmann admits of Jn 1828 (Life of Jesus, Eng. tr. p. 480), 'a fragment of the good tradition preserved in the Johannine Gospel.' The idea of Christ's publicity (1820) is, of course, a genuinely Johannine trait (cf. 7141.), but this does not explain why the author should have invented the Annas trial for it.

Pilate, by Johannine conceptions. The Fourth Cospel, it is true, ignores the details of the trial before Calaphaa, but this difficulty is not more serious than that of the Synoptic silence upon the Annas trial, for the latter might well appear too imaguificant or private to be retained beside the Calaphas trial, or even to be accurately distinguished from it. As the ex-high priest had no power to pronounce sentence, the tendency of tradition would naturally be towards the decisive proceedings before maphas. The traditional order of the text in Jn 18, however, does The traditional order of the text in Jn 18, however, does not appear to represent the original. Some distortion has taken place, as the Smatic Syriac version shows, and efforts have been made to restore the true sequence (see Moffatt, The Hubstori New Test, pp 1284; 6021f), perhaps the most plausible proposal builty that of Professor G. G. Findlay, who would read v. 18-21 between v. 14 and v. 15. Some such rearrangement is necessary, at any rate, in order to give a coherent sense to the passage, the denial of Feter taking place, as in the Synoptic account, at the house of Camphas (1515-25-27). On Wellhausen's recent attempt to excess all the allusions to Calaphas, see the present writer's paper in the Expositor (1419-1907, pp. 55-49).

It does not necessarily follow from Lk 32 that St. Luke assumed the high priest of 22847, was Annas. But if he did, he (or his source at this point) taintly corrects the Markan tradition. On the other hand, St. Luke sproves Camphas entirely. When the Council meet, they act unanimously and simultaneously (22867), there is no need of any mouthpiece or spokesman.

These efforts of the high priest and the Council

These efforts of the high priest and the Council to secure evidence against Jesus proved at first a failure. Many witnesses came forward, but nothing tangible or crucial could be made out of their statements." At last some people appeared with a garbled version of one saying which seemed relevant and final. As given by the three writers who record it, it runs thus :

MARK (14<sup>26</sup>). MATTHEW (20<sup>21</sup>). JOHN (2<sup>19</sup>). I will destroy (Acces I am able to de-Destroy (Acces) Auru) Ehts tei temple made the temple of God, this temple, with hands, and after three days and after threadays and in three days livil build another to build it.

The saying bears on its face the stamp of authenticity, that it is impossible to ascertain its original place or significance. The Synoptic omission of its utterance by Jesus is all the more striking, since it would fit in excellently with the Synoptic account of the cleansing of the Temple, which preceded and determined the arrest of Jesus. The Fourth Evangelist, who misplaces this incident, actually cites it in this very connexion (Jn 219), but characteristically he gives it a double meaning. Jesus, he declares, was speaking of His resurrection, the temple being the body -according to the familiar symbolism of the age. The Jews, however, took Him literally. In all probability the saying was one of those mystic pregnant words which imply more than they explicitly state, or than any one thought of when they were first uttered ' (cf. Bruce, Kingdom of God, pp. 306-310). The original mean ing may have been that Jesus, who claimed to be greater than the Temple (Mt 12°), would raise His community, even though the dewish system of worship was shattered. His cause was not bound worship was shattered. His cause was not bound up with the Temple. If He came to associate His own death with the run of the sanctuary, it was inevitable that the conception of His personal resurrection should further colour the saying. But in any case the later Christian reflexion would read it in the light of the resurrection, whether with or without any historical justification. The Fourth Evangelist, who makes Jesus not only fully conscious of His Messianic dignity and approaching death from the first, but outspoken on the subject, has naturally no difficulty in placing the statement at the threshold of His ministry, and it has been argued that this length of time between the saying and its quotation at the trial is historically neces sary in order to explain 'that hesitation and contradiction about the evidence of the "false witnesses," and the extreme difficulty in procuring it, which both St. Matthew's and St. Mark's accounts of the trial of Christ distinctly attest' (R. H. Hutton, Theological Essays, p. 228). The contention is unconvincing. Such a saying, if uttered even a day or two before to an excited crowd, would readily be caught up and twisted according to the sympathies or the antipathies of people. Words such as those of Mk 13 would inevitably colour it, and the passion of these utter-ances indicates that the mind of Jesus must have been concerned with the Temple and its future in relation to His message more deeply than our extant records happen to disclose. In any case, popular animus needed but a few days to distort an enigmatic saying of this kind. Many versions of it would be affect on the bubbling tide of gossip in the Jerusalem streets, and some of these were uttered by hostile lips to hostile ears before the

The term seas (Mk 14%, cf v 80) refers to harmony of statement. Had the Evangelist meant 'adequate 'equal to the Octasion' he would have used season or some equivalent.

St. Mark bluntly calls this information a piece of false evidence, false because it marepresented the real meaning of Jesus by attributing to Him a revolutionary design of which He was innocent. It failed, owing to the disagreement of the wit-nesses. For some reason, which the Evangelist leaves unexplained, their testimonies did not tally: on coherent and decisive proof could be jucked out of their conflicting reports. St. Matthew, on the other hand, will not go this length. Not merely is be silent upon the disagreement of the witnesses (contrast Mk 14<sup>95, 86</sup>), but he refuses to call them false witnesses outright, although this may be implied in 20<sup>85–80</sup>. To the Evangelist any witness against Jesus probably counted as false witness. He lays atress upon the original desire of the authorities to find false witness, implying that they would stick at nothing to secure the conviction of Jesus, and that they eventually managed to secure evidence which, being in itself blasphemous, and being legally corroborated by two witnesses (2800-40), enabled them to proceed with their design. St. Mark, who admits that the authorities were bent on compassing the death of Jesus, does not accuse them of deliberately scarching for false witness from the first, though he points out that even the evidence they secured was inadequate from a legal standpoint (cf. vol. i. 575-576).

Both agree, however, that Jesus, on being challenged by the high priest, refused to answer the charge. He kept a dignified silence, probably for the reason given in the words put by Luke into His mouth (22<sup>27 6</sup>) It was alle to argue with those who had already made up their minds to find Him guilty. His stern, calm silence was a judgment of His so-called judges. Their malevolute varieties of the so-called judges. lent prejudice deprived them of the right to de-mand information about His mission. The high mand information about His mission. The high priest, who spoke in their name, was tager, not to elicit the truth, but to make the prisoner incriminate Himself as a megath or sacrilegious for of Judaism, by giving some explanation of the alleged saying. The silence of Jesus baffled and alleged saying. The silence of Jesus battled and irritated bins. It threw him out in his calculations. There were probably some in the Council who were not particularly favourable to the designs of Annas and Caiaphas; the father to attack Jesus for cleansing the Temple may indicate, per haps, that several members t rather approved of

* Of Bushpeli's Nature and the Supernatural (b) x \( \) i They reasoned or might have reasoned that the eleating of the Temple would be a very unlikely act in the part of a reformer who designed its destructure. the act; and it was a matter of moment to bring the whole Council into line against Jesus, to reservery interest, saceriotal (cf. vol. i. pp. 297-298) and official, in order that a unanimous verdict niight be carried to Pilate. Furthermore, there was the people to consider. Jesus had sympathicors whose number was unascertained. If He the whole Council into line against Jesus, to rouse thizers whose number was unascertained. If He was to be got rid of, it must be on some broad, serious charge which might command a wave of overwhelming popular enthusiasm and indignation. Sacerdotal diplomacy is generally a past master in the art of playing upon such prejudices and organizing popular feeling in aid of its own ends, and the next move of the high priest showed no inconsiderable skill. He chose his new ground admirably. But it is not clear why he shifted his position so auddenly. Was he aware of the Messianic claims of Jesus and astute enough to use them, as a last resource, for the purpose of forcing some incriminating answer? Or was the ground really shifted? Might it be inferred from the primitive Evangelic tradition, as reproduced by Mk. and Mt. alike, that the saying about the Temple (Mk 1426 = Mt 2641) was held to imply a sort of Messianic claim "upon the part of Jesus" In that event, the high priest's next question would be simply a further move on the line already taken. The former hypothesis is, upon the whole, the more likely of the two. But in any case the point is plain. Foiled by the silence of Jesus in his attempt to make capital out of the witnesses' report, Caiaphas proceeds to put the straight and final question, 'Art thou the Christ?' (Nk 14st = Mt 26st, cf. Lk 22st; Mk.'s addition, 'the Son of the Blessed,' is probably more original than Mt.'s generalized 'the Son of God').† It was a categorical and crucial query. Matters were now brought to an issue which Jesus could not and would not evade. simply a further move on the line already taken. would not evade.

His answer is variously reported: 'I am (éyà elu): and you will see the Son of Man scated on the right hand of the Power, and coming with the clouds of heaven' (Mk 14th); 'It is as thou suyest (où drai). Yet I tell you, in future you will see the Son of Man scated on the right hand of the Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven' (Mt 28th); 'You will not help to the left you may will see a proper of I coming on the clouds of heaven (Mt 20"); You will not believe if I tell you, nor will you answer if I question you. But from henceforth the Son of Man shall be seated on the right hand of the Power of God' (Lk 22"). Primarily, the saying is a reminiscence and application of the Messianic passage in Dn 713, though the Speaker has also the opening of Ps 110 in His mind—a psalm which in those days was more than once upon His lips (cf. Mk 12<sup>al</sup>). So much is clear But the details of the answer are not always quite intelligible. Thus St. Luke; divides the question into two, and, in reply to the query, 'Art thou the Son of God!' makes Jesus reply but here, but the first elm (22%). On the other hand, the Markan answer is perfectly explicit (cf. Menzies, The Earliest Gospel, p. 267). Jesus replies, 'I am.' St. Matthew, again, gives an evasive or ambiguous turn to the words by the phrase of coar, which here, as in 26°, is commonly understood to mean a qualified affirmative. The person addressed replies in the sense of the questioner. 'You say so. I will not contradict you.' I answer you out of your own lips.' Recently, however, Chwolson, followed by Merx, N. Schmidt (The Prophet of Nazareth, p. 287), and others, has challenged the interpretation of the phrase as a Rabbinic form of affirmation; instead of being equivalent to the Latin dixieti, it is held to be really a denial. This is most unlikely, to judge from the context; and even linguistically, as Dalman has shown (Words of Jesus, p. 309 f.), it is unnecessary.*

But, minor discrepancies apart, the answer reveals three cardinal traits of Jesus. His courage in confessing the Messianic vocation, when death was the inevitable consequence; His serene confidence in the success of His cause upon earth; and the real meaning of His Person.† The last point is to be noted specially. The high priest's question was so contrived as to make any answer fatal, whether negative or affirmative. In the one case, Jesus would lose all His influence and authority : in the other, He would be liable to judgment as a pretender. But Jesus realized that even a bare afirmative would be misleading, since His Messianic vocation was widely different from what the ordinary expectation imagined. Hence the fuller state-ment, wrung from the tension and passionate faith of His soul. The words seized on by the Council were those referring to His claim to sit at the right hand of the Power, but it must not be inferred; from this that the charge of constructive blasphemy for which Jesus was condenned was dissociated from His Messianic claims. The condissociated from his Messianic claims. The contention that such claims were not blasphemous in themselves all depends on the character of the person who made them. The Council considered themselves, rightly or wrongly, absolved from entering into any minute examination of the conduct and aims of Jesus. On that their minds were already made up, as His arrest shows. The attitude of Jesus to the Law and the Temple and the cherished religious traditions of Justiere left the cherished religious traditions of Judaism left no doubt in their minds that He was a dangerous person, in whom it would be superfluous to look for any Messianic criteria. His presumption in claiming Messianic honour was in itself blaspheny of a capital order, as it involved a supersession of the Mosaic Law, and His words now corroborated the impression already made by His actions that He was a discredited pretender to Divine rank, and a false and disloyal prophet. In short, the verdict of the historian, as Holtzmann puts it, must be: 'Jesus confessed Himself to be Messiah, was condemned as a false Messiah, and executed as a pretender.

Caiaphas had now gained his point. He had induced Jesus to convict Himself out of His own mouth, and with a pious greature of horror (cf. 2 K 221), 1 Mac 117, Is 37 etc.) he professes himself at once shocked by the blasphemy of the Galilscan, and satisfied with the result of his interrogation. He appeals theatrically to the Council if this is not be justified by the emergency which had trans-pired. The Evangelic tradition was naturally more concerned with the result than with the precise processes of the trial. In any case, how-ever, it is unmistakable that the priests had now got what they wanted. They had secured from Jesus a confession which was nominally equivalent to a blasphenious claim (on this see vol. 1 pp. 209-210), derogatory to the Divine Being. But we are in the dark as to how far the ordinary forms of jurisprudence were observed, whether the witness were cautioned before giving evidence, whether the were cautioned before giving evidence, whether the case for the defence was first of all opened, and so forth. The outstanding point is that Jesus was condemned primarily for blasphemy. To convict Him of claiming to be Messiah, and charge Him with that, would not have appealed to the Sadduces. More was needed, and this was supplied by the fact of Jesus, a Galilaan peasant, with revolutionary views upon the cultus, daring to claim for Himself Messianic honours, and thus threatening to superrede the successorie level asystem of to supersede the sacrosanct legal system of Judaism.

(b) Jesus before Pilate (Mk 15)-2 - Mt 271-41 = Lk 231-35 = Jn 182-1934). —If the proceedings before the Jewish Council strained even the letter of justice, those before the Roman authorities show little or no attempt whatsoever to try the prisoner judicially. Jesus does not appear to have been legally tried before Pilate. The Roman governor, after the first turn in the case, seems to have been principally anxious to discover the most politic course of action, as well as to thwart the authorities. His sense of justice was overborne by considerations of personal advantage and civil prudence. But he was not driven to thus end without reluctance, and the record of the proceedings, which took place in the open-air in front of his palace or tribunal, is of considerable psychological interest.

The first phase of the trial before Pilate is the procurator adismissal of the grave charge of majestas brought against Jesus by His accusers, who naturally fixed upon the political rather than the religious side of the Messianic claim as the more likely to carry weight with the governor.

According to one tradition, Pulate takes the According to one trainton, thate takes the initiative by asking Jesus if He is really the king of the Jews. The question breathes pity and contempt and wonder. This forlorn Galilean peasant (σύ emphatic) a claimant of royalty! The quiet reply is, σι λίγοι (cf. vol. i. 93!). To the subsequent outburst of accusation from the Jewish leaders, Jesus vouchsafes no reply; nor will He even deign to interpret His silence to the astonished procurator. Plainly, this is a very abridged version of the actual facts, and we turn for fuller details to Luke. According to his account, the Jewish authorities push forward with their accusation before Pulate has time to speak, and the charge is threefold. He is accused of being a sentious agitator, of forbidding the payment of tribute to the Roman emperor, and of claiming to be 'Christ, a king'. A political charge is thus eleverly foisted into the religious complaint, and the procurator, who would have pathing to do with who would have nothing to do with a vague accusa-tion, naturally fixes on the third point, asking Jesus (as in the other tradition) if He is really the king of the Jews. Luke's account certainly gives a better sense here than the other, for it explains how Pilate came to put his question; whereas, in the evidence of Mk 152=Mt 271, there is nothing the evidence of Mrk 13 = Mr 23 *, there is nothing to account for the governor seizing this point at all. That the charge of the Jews was astute but unjust needs no proof (cf. vol. i. p. 246*). The Gospels show how scrupulously Jesus kept clear of abetting the fanatical hatred of Rome felt by many of His the fanatical hatred of Rome felt by many of His fellow-countrymen, and probably it was this refusal to side with them which secretly instigated their plan of attack. At any rate, as Renan observes, 'Conservative religious bodies do not generally shrink from calumny.' To refute the charge was superfluous in the eyes of Jesus. His silence did all that was necessary; it repudiated the ac-

The silence of Jesus before Pilate was due to moral reasons. Dr. Salmen, in his posthumous work, The Human Flessent in the Gospels (1907, p. 512), prefers, indeed, to attribute it to physical fatigue. The oils was that on urstonness assuming for His silence is that, after the strain of the work of the previous day, of the sleepless silght, and the heutal insults of His tormentors, His physical frame was incapable of conducting a discussion. And we could sufficiently account for Phate is unwillingness to condemn if he perceived that the man against whom so much accussion was brought was quite unable to say a word in His own defence. In this chose between Jesus and Barabbas, might he not feel that the more dangerous enems to Cossar was the main in signorum health who had already taken part in an insurpretion in which many lives had been lost, and not the so-called prophet, who seemed in also to speak much less to see a And if he had no trust in the locality of the Jesush advisers, might he not have even suspected that they were willing to surrifice one who would be really dargeoine? Whatever may be thought of the psychological a agreetions in the latter part of this paragraph, the opening see here, does not seem adequate to the facts. Even when wearred (201, Jesus would not allow fatigue to prevent Him from speaking if atterance were necessary. If He was silent, it was because He was unwilling not because He felt unable. Headen, the impression left by the record of the last two days of the life of Jesus in that His physical strength much have been considerable. I pon the whole, then, it is needless to attribute His silence before hance underly the impression of innocence were useless, coupled, as that be left was, with a calm conscious of ir with which left no room for even a vestige of an riet's about the ultimate su wess of H s carse.

The impression made by Jesus upon Pilate started a series of attempts upon the part of the procurator to extricate himself and his prisoner from the situation created by the rancour of the Jewish authorities. Three separate movements were made by him in this direction. The first was to change the venue of the trial; for Herod was to change the venue of the constant pudge this as a Galilean might be expected to judge this challeng neglant more fairly than the Jerusalem authorities. After this device had failed, Pilate tried to get behind the priests, and appeal to the better feelings of the people when unbiassed by sweedotal and ecclesiastical intrigues, surely a Messiah would be popular, he argued, recollecting the hot patriotism of the nation. But, to his disgust and dismay, Barabbas was preferred to Jeaus. Finally, as a last resource, he tried to work on their pity, now that their patriotism was out of the question, he presented Jesus to them, with the bloody marks of scourging muon Him, as an object to excite compassion (In 1995) again proved of no avail, and with its collapse Pilate saw the disappearance of the last chance of rescuing the prisoner. Such is, in rough outline, the scheme of events which we can recover from a careful scrntiny of the extant records.

St. Luke, indeed, makes Pilate at once pronounce Jesus innocent (23°). But this is far too abrupt The probability is that (Mk 15° Mt 27° °) the priests and elders continued to heap fresh accusations upon Him, and that His silence under the strain of calumny roused Pilate's astonishment. The procurator was evidently puzzled to know what to do with this prisoner. For though silence may have been equivalent, in Roman law, to a confession of guilt, he was unwilling to pronounce sentence in this case without some further evidence, and the invectives of the Jewish authorities did and the invectives of the Jewish authorities did not point to any conclusive or reliable ground for arriving at a judgment. The very silence of Jesus, as Keim properly observes, impressed the procurator more than the eager, noisy vehemence of His opponents. 'He did not infer guilt or obstinacy from the silence, as the official and imperious consciousness even of a mild Pliny the Younger was apt so quickly to do: an evidence Younger was apt so quickly to do: an evidence this of Pilate's intelligence, and still more of the impression produced by the Lord even when He uttered no words.' In the midst of this perplexity the word 'Galilee,' flung up on the torrent of invective, caught his ear. He seemed to see a chance of relieving himself, and perhaps of helping Jesus. For if Jesus had been guilty of crime within the borders of Galilee, plainly Herod Antipas was the man to deal with Him; he might be more impartial, too, than the local priests and Younger was apt so quickly to do: an evidence be more impartial, too, than the local priests and scribes. Besides, it was a politic attention to Antipas. So the procurator gladly dismissed his prisoner to the Galilæan tetrarch, only too relieved to be quit, as he hoped, of this inconvenient responsibility. But this change of venue was futile. It was not exactly illegal, for, as has been observed, the words of Lk 23<sup>4</sup> are probably introduced too early; the other Gospels know nothing of such an acquittal at this point. But it did not help Pilate. The crafty Herod was shy of touching on whare of maintain. any charge of majestas. As Mr. Taylor Innes puts it, 'the Idumean fox dreaded the lion's paw, while very willing to exchange courtesies with the lion's deputy.

The transference of Jesus to Herod (cf. vol. i. 722) is one of St. Luke's special contributions to the story of the Passion (238-18, cf. Ac 427). Whether taken from oral tradition (cf. Justin Martyr, Dial. 103) or from the Jewish Christian source (note the technical Jewish χριστίο Sasyλία=king Messiah, 239) which some critics trace below his narrative, it goes back to the memories of the Christians who belonged to the Herodian entourags (cf. 83 94), and ought never to have been suspected by a sane criticism. No satisfactory motive for its invention can be adduced.* St. Luke (13) was perfectly aware that, when it suited his purpose, Pilate had no hesitation in killing Gallisans. The author rightly hints at other motives for his action now. The presence of the high priests and scribes at the interview (v.10) is, at first sight, certainly a difficulty; it might suggest that here, as perhaps at 2222 (cf. 2286), the historian has gone too far in emphasizing the activity of the Jewish authorities. But it is just possible that they feared to let the prisoner out of their sight. Herod was not to be relied on. He might take it into his head to release Jesus out of spite or caprice, as Pilate had threatened to do, and with relentless tyigour some of the authorities may have kept on the track of their victim. The omission of 2316-12 in the Sinaitic Syriac version is probably due to harmonizing tendencies. Certainly 2315 affords no adequate ground for excising it (so Wellhausen 1) as a later gloss, for even if the inferior reading, 'I sent him (Jesus) to him (Herod),' be adopted, it does not necessarily imply that the authorities were not present at Herod's examination. Pilate is not giving them fresh information. He is simply rehearsing the facts of the case in a semi-formal fashion.

St. Luke does not exaggerate the share of Herod in Christ's death, as does the later Gospel of Peter, which makes Antipas sentence the prisoner formally. The historian simply brings out the idle curiosity of the tetrarch. The mockery of Jesus, in which he is said even to have participated himself, was probably due to irritation at his failure to elicit any answer from the prisoner. Herod's wounded dignity and baffled curiosity were up in arms to take a petty vengeance (cf. vol. i. 454a), and both he and Pilate were consoled for their trouble and annoyance by getting their feud

opportunity of a politic and inexpensive generosity. Pilate then, according to Luke, proposes a weak compromise (23<sup>13-16</sup>). To appease the Jews he will scourge this harmless fanatic, Jesus, before releasing Him; for release Him he must, as His guilt has not been proven. The innocence of Jesus seems to be formally pronounced. Herod's refusal to convict Him gives Pilate the tardy courage to acquit the prisoner before His accusers, but it does acquit the prisoner before His accusers, but it does not lend him courage to carry out the strict legal consequences of the decision. Utilitarian motives come into play.* The governor realizes that he must try to conciliate the infuriated Jews. Since his offer to scourge Jesus is ignominiously rejected, some other compromise must be devised.

Here all the Gospels come into line, with an account of Pilate's next attempt to save Jesus, this time at the expense of Barabbas (see BARABBAS and INSURRECTION), though St. Luke less happily omits all reference to the custom of releasing a prisoner, and makes the idea of Barabbas originate with the Jews (23<sup>18</sup>), not with Pilate, while St. Matthew inserts a piece of very secondary tradition about Pilate's wife (27<sup>19</sup>, cf. vol. i. p. 495) in order to explain the governor's hesitation, as well as to throw the malice of the Jews into relief. A further addition + of St. Matthew is the dramatic incident of Pilate washing his hands before the people, and proclaiming his innocence of the judicial crime which they were bent on perpetrating (27<sup>24, 25</sup>).‡ The incident may be St. Matthew's anecdotal way of depicting the idea of the Jews' real responsibility for the death of Jesus. In any case, once the people deliberately prefer Barabbas, Pilate plainly throws off all responsibility for all that follows. Probably the revelation of Christ's unpopularity § removed the last scruple of conscience which he felt. Why should he endanger his position and risk a tunult among the people for the sake of a Galilæan dreamer who had not a single adherent to stand by Him? Pilate could afford to thwart the priests, perhaps, but it was another matter when the people asserted their wishes. In response to his half-perplexed, half-ironical inquiry as to what, then, is to be done with Jesus inquiry as to what, then, is to be done with Jesus the so-called Christ, the reply (unanimous, according to Mt 27<sup>22</sup>) is, 'Crucify him.' Carlyle, in the sixth of his Latter-day Pamphlets, takes this to be an illustration of the absurdity of universal suffrage. 'Can it be proved that since the beginning of the world there was ever given a universal vote in favour of the worthiest man or thing? I have always understood that true worth in any department was difficult to recognize; that the worthiest, if he appealed to universal suffrage, would have but a poor chance. . . . Alas, Jesus Christ asking the Jews what He deserved, was Christ asking the Jews what ne ueser, and not the answer, Death on the gallows!' But the moint of the incident is not quite this. The Markan tradition, followed by Matthew (27<sup>50</sup> = Mk 15<sup>11</sup>), indicates the responsibility of the priests rather than of the people. The latter were inand do not cleanse their hands.

1 Note the intentional repetition of value vires from 274.

The opposition of the people to Pilate's suggestion may have been due in part to his own unpopularity. The Jews would readily take any opportunity of thwarting a proposal from one who had so repeatedly defied their prejudices and religious tastes.

stigated by the sacerdotal authorities, who were afraid of Pilate's appeal, and jealous' of the possible popularity which Jesus might win among the crowd. Accordingly they worked—how, we are not told—upon the passions of the mob, religious and political. The result was a wild outcry for the release of Barabbas, which at once showed Pilate that Jesus was not a favourite of the people, but merely a discredited provincial.

The general outline of the closing scene, despite variations in detail, is fairly distinct. Pilate allows himself to be overborne by the popular clamour. Finding that his attempts to expostulate with the mob are fruitless, he at last lets them have their own way, pronouncing the fatal words έξελευση είς σταυρόν (ibis ad crucem).

Before ordering the prisoner off to the death which, in Roman law, must immediately follow the capital sentence, he bids the lictor, I, lictor, conliga nanus, flagellis verberetur; Jesus is then subjected to the scourging which preceded, in Roman usage,† the last act of the death punishment. Such at least, according to one tradition (Mk 15<sup>18</sup> = Mt 27<sup>28</sup>), was the significance of the scourging; it was a mere accessory to the crucifixion. In Luke, it occupies an earlier and a different position, as we have seen, whilst ‡ in the Fourth Gospel (19<sup>1t.</sup>) it forms part of the mockery, and issues in Pilate's presentation of Jesus to the people in order to excite a pity or a contempt which might allay their malice. This is probably correct. In closely associating the scourging with the mockery, though not in placing them prior to the formal condemnation, the Fourth Evangelist is following the Markan tradition. He rightly brings out the third and last appeal of Pilate, before the final sentence is pronounced.

Pilate, before the final sentence is pronounced. But for the details of this bloody punishment we must look outside the Gospels. All four eschew any harrowing pictures of the scene. The simple and sober mention of the fact is all that the tradition has preserved.

(c) The mocking of Jesus (see Crown of Thorns, Mockery, Reed, Thorns).—That Jesus was insulted and ill-treated during the course of His trial is a fixed part of the Evangelic tradition, but it is uncertain when and where the cruel sport took place. According to one tradition (Mk 1489) took place. According to one tradition (Mk  $14^{65}$  = Mt  $26^{67.68}$ ) it followed the condemnation by the Sanhedrin; either the bystanders | or the servants

Sanhedrin; either the bystanders || or the servants

* This ill-will (Mk 1510=Mt 2718) towards one who had challenged their vested interests and ecclesiastical authority was patent to Pilate (cf. vol. i. 521 f., and Lidgett's Spiritual Principle of the Atonement, p. 11 l.). As we know from the record of his previous conflict with the Jews, he took an insolent delight in humiliating them, which had thrice led to an even more humiliating surrender upon his own part. The trial of Jesus gave him another chance of thwarting the authorities. But he had learned prudence by this time. He would use Jesus as far as possible to exasperate the Jews, but he would have little hesitation in sacrificing his prisoner to safeguard his own credit and popularity, particularly when he found that the Galilzan was unpopular Himself.

† Thus the Jews caught outside Jerusalem during the siege by Titus 'were first scourged, then tormented with all kinds of torture before they died, and were crucified opposite the walls of the city 'Jos. B.J. v. xi. 1).

† Perhaps founding on the hint of Lk 2323, where it is part of Pilate's suggested compromise. The position of the scourging, with the subsequent Ecce Homo incident (Jn 1913.41,), is rightly assigned by the Fourth Evangelist.

† How far the tradition has been affected by the natural desire (cf. Ac 1327.23) to conform the sufferings of Jesus to such OT prophecies as Is 5081 (cf. Mic 51), it is impossible to determine. Even Matthew, with his predictedion for discovering fulfilment of prophecy, does not refer to such passages. The likelihood is, as Strauss admits (§ 123), that while Jesus was actually maltreated as the Evangelists record, 'their descriptions are modelled on prophecies which, when once Jesus appeared as a sufferer and maltreated person, were applied to Him.

¶ Apparently including even some of the councillors themselves—a trait of Oriental passion which, in view of Jos. BJ VI. v. 3, is not to be taken as a touch of the Evangelic tradition inconsistent with the dignity of the authorities. Wellhausen thinks Mt.'s version (=high priests) is original.

of the high priest or the councillors (Mt.) blindfolded Him, spat in His face, and rained blows upon Him, asking Him with jeers to prophesy who struck Him. St. Luke (2263-65) more accurately places this horseplay during the nocturnal interval between His arrest and the assembling of the Council in the morning, when no responsible parties were present to prevent vulgar indignities being heaped on the defenceless prisoner. St. Luke also narrates (2311) that Herod and his troops treated their prisoner with rough ridicule as a soi-disant king; and, when the incident of the Herod interview is accepted as historical, there is no reason to doubt that such violence may have been inflicted, unless Luke is held to have transferred to Herod the mockery which the earlier tradition (Mk 15<sup>16-20</sup>, Mt 27<sup>27-21</sup>) ascribes to Pilate.

This second mockery consisted in the troops arraying Jesus in a scarlet military mantle, spitting on Him (in caricature of the kiss of homage), crowning Him with thorns, putting a reed in His hand, and paying mock deference to Him.+ Then, beating Him unmercifully, they stripped Him of this finery, and reclothed Him in His own garments. 'In our time, when a man has been sentenced to death, we do not think it right to add to his sufferings by preliminary right to add to his sufferings by preliminary by tanders, in their indignation, added to what had been sentenced by the judge, all this was looked upon as no more than giving the criminal his deserts; and this volunteered addition to the judge's sentence was no doubt the severest part of the penalty.' The rough treatment of Jesus, however, by the soldiers of Pilate took place within the barracks. As it was aimed at the nation through the person of Jesus, it was not politic to conduct it in the open air.

The mockery of Jesus was thus twofold. That inflicted by the Jews was meant for Jesus the prophet; that of the Roman soldiers, as of Herod's Syrian troops, was occasioned by His pretensions to be a king. He was ill-treated, as He was condemned and crucified, for being a royal pretender. There is no reason to suppose that the second mockery is an unhistorical echo of the former, or that even the former is (Brandt, Evangel. gesch. p. 69 f.) constructed elaborately out of Old Testament suggestions. But a more real problem has been raised, in recent years, with regard to the meaning of the mockery. Several scholars § have attempted to find, in the details of this incident, allusions to the mock coronation which preceded the grotesque Saturnalia of the Sacaan festival in ancient Babylonia, -celebrated throughout Asia in ancient Babylonia,—celebrated throughout Asia.

*Professor Burkitt (The Gospel History and its Transmission, pp. 51-53) holds that vis intervé vaices es (Mt 2689) is a secondary addition of the Evangelist, and that the real meaning of Mk 1488 is that the face of Jesus was covered because He was formally condemned (Est 78). But, in this event, the blindfolding would immediately follow the condemnation, whereas the spitting intervenes, showing that horseplay had begun. Besides, Luke's version corroborates the Markan view as reproduced in Matthew, and probably is one of his harmonizing touches, which smooth out details in Mark and Matthew into a graphic and intelligible picture. Wellhausen omits the blindfolding in Mk 1489 (with D and Syr<sup>sin</sup>), which, in his view of the context (see above), implies that the prophesying of Jesus was to be about the destruction of the Temple.

† A similar grim jest was practised by the Mediterranean pirates upon any Roman citizen whom they captured. Plutarch (Vita Pomp. xxiv.) describes how they affected to be struck with terror, dropped on their knees before him, threw a toga round him, and finally made away with him.

‡ Salmon, The Human Element in the Gospels (p. 506). The soldiers were probably seizing the opportunity to vent their contempt for the Jews, quite as much as to express personal animosity towards Jesus.

§ J. G. Frazer, Golden Beugh<sup>2</sup>, ii. 241, 2531, iii. 1501. Wendland, in his paper on Jesus as a Saturnalian king (Hermes, 1898, pp. 175-170), thinks that the Roman troops ridiculed Him in the farcical garb of Saturn; but the late Acta of Dasius the martyr are too unreliable to serve as evidence for this period, even had the Romans been tolerant of human sacrifices.

Minor in connexion with the worship of the Persian goddess Anaitis,-where, in the course of other orgies, 'a condemned prisoner was arrayed in royal attire, only in the end to be stript of his borrowed finery, scourged, and hanged or cruci-fied.' Another theory (advocated by Reich in his essay on Der König mit der Dornerkrone, 1905) casts back to the popular buffoonery which accompanied the mimes, e.g. at Alexandria (cf. Philo, in Flacc. 5-6, quoted by Grotius in this connexion), while Mr. W. R. Paton (in ZNTW, 1901, 339-341) further points out that the trait of a triple crucifixion reflects the Persian custom of crucifying a pretender or usurper upon three crosses. It is, of course, quite possible that two robbers were crucified with Jesus simply because no more happened to be in prison at the moment; but, in view of this custom, it seems not unlikely that the number of victims, like the mock homage paid previously to one of them, may have been determined by some hazy notion of imitating a pagan bit of ritual. The un-Jewish character of these accompaniments of the crucifixion would certainly lend additional relish to the soldiers' contemptuous pleasure in crucifying a caricature of a Jewish monarch.* But, while the possibility of this may be granted, it is impossible to regard the Gospel accounts as legendary products of any such pagan custom. For one thing, Jesus was not crucified on three crosses, nor was His death taken as an offering. Again, Dr. Frazer's identification of Purim with Saccea is too precarious to support firmly the inference that Jesus perished as a Haman at this Jewish festival; nor did it require any coarse pagan rite to stimulate military horseplay among soldiers, even although they may have been, like Herod's Syrian troops, familiar with such customs, or had been, like Pilate's Roman legions, stationed at one time on the Euphrates where the rites in question may have survived. It is extremely unlikely that such a confusion of Sacæa with the Jewish festivals should have arisen, or that any reminiscence of the Alexandrian outburst should have prompted the records of the horseplay at Jerusalem.‡ See, further, art. Mockery.

paragram (Mk 145, Jn 1829) is a blow inflicted with the open hand (cf. Field's Notes on the Transl. of the NT, p. 105). This is the most probable meaning, on the whole, though the dubiety of the reading in the former passage (βλαλον οτ βλαλον, λλαμβανο οτ έλαλον) introduces a slight element of uncertainty as to the

4. Special points in the NT narratives.—Most of the characteristic features in the various reports of the trial have already been noted, but it remains for us to glance briefly at the Evangelic records one by one. The Petrine tradition in Mk. (cf. Bennett in Expositor, Dec. 1906, p. 545f.) is substantially reproduced in Mt., most of whose additions are of secondary historical importance. St. Luke, again, appears to have access to a special source for this part of his narrative, while the Fourth Gospel presents a problem of peculiar intricacy, since its record of the Passion contains not merely elements which in form and content are plainly due to the writer's underlying religious aims, but also one or two passages which are either modelled upon the Lukan tradition or due to a good source which may have been known, at an earlier period, independently to St. Luke himself.

St. Mt.'s omission of the blindfolding of Jesus (26<sup>66,67</sup>) is certainly remarkable, but it merely gives another view of the scene. We see Jesus pulled hither and thither by a crowd of exasperated fanatics, twisted from side to side, knocked about, struck behind His back, and jeeringly invited to guess who struck Him. The blindfolding makes the picture more dramatic, but not more intelligible. On the other hand, the introduction of οι πρεσβύτεροι in 27<sup>12.20</sup> (cf. 27<sup>41</sup>), and of τον λεγόμενον Χριστόν (27<sup>22</sup>), is probably due to the author's characteristic desire to accentuate the Jewish details, while changes such as the omission of Mark's favourite hotarro (26<sup>67, 71</sup> 27<sup>29</sup>), or the substitution of acrists for imperfects (26<sup>60, 67, 72, 75</sup> 27<sup>18, 24</sup>), are simply literary and stylistic, adding nothing to the real sense of the narrative. Evidently the author or editor of Matthew had not access to any wider channel of authentic information than he found in the Markan tradition. At one point it is possible that the canonical text of Mark has even been enriched from Matthew, for the words δ έστιν πραιτώριον (Mk 15<sup>16</sup>), as Prof. Menzies (The Earliest Gospel, p. 276) after Brandt observes, do nothing 'to make Mark's narrative clearer, but rather the opposite, and may have crept in first as a gloss on the margin from Matthew, where the statement appears to be that the soldiers took Jesus off to another building, viz. to the practorium, and collected there the whole cohort.' See Blass in ExpT x. [1899] 185 f.

belongs to the Lukan narrative. Thus the freedom with which the historian has treated the Markan narrative* may be gathered from the fact that his order, in the opening scenes of the trial (denials of Peter, mockery of Jesus, examination of Jesus), exactly reverses that of the earlier Gospels. He also forgets to mention that any evidence † was laid against Jesus (cf. 22<sup>56</sup>), or that Jesus was ever bound—a point on which the Fourth Evangelist is more correct (Jn 18<sup>12</sup>). Furthermore, he omits all reference to the saying about the destruction of the Temple, though it was plainly known to him the Temple, though it was plainly known to him (cf. Ac 6<sup>14</sup>). Possibly an 'apologetic' motive underlay this alteration. If Luke, writing after the destruction of the Temple, viewed it as a Divine judgment upon Israel, 'which might be regarded as inflicted by Jesus Himself, he might wish to avoid saying that the testimony' of the witnesses 'was false,' and so left out the entire inquiry before the Council (EBi 1772). The attempt to trace an 'apologetic' element in 23<sup>12</sup>, as though this meant the pact of Judaism and pagazism against meant the pact of Judaism and paganism against Christianity (cf. Ac 4"), is rather beside the mark, however. Herod considered Jesus quite beneath his notice, no danger was to be apprehended from Him; He was beneath hatred, though not below contempt. Nor did Pilate regard the prisoner with enmity. It is indubitable, on the other hand, that St. Luke views the conduct of the people at this point in a more severe light than the other Gospels. He omits the sacerdotal device (cf. 23<sup>18</sup> with Mk 15<sup>11</sup> and Mt 27<sup>20</sup>), writing as though the people of their own accord demanded Barabbas (cf. also 22<sup>66</sup> 23<sup>1, 2, 13</sup>), at one in this with the high priests and the rulers, though possibly, in view of passages like 18<sup>43</sup> 19<sup>46</sup> 21<sup>36</sup>, we are to take the people here as supporters of the priests.‡ The Fourth Evangelist, again, takes a slightly milder view of the people (cf. the omission in 196), and this leads us to notice the idiosyncrasies of the trialstory in that Gospel.

Here Peter (cf. vol. i. 444-445) is not the only

†The condensed nature of his account here lends too precipitate a character to the proceedings. Possibly the search for witnesses was loosely begun during the night; but even so Luke's narrative is defective on this point. That he knew the Markan tradition of the false evidence is plain from the retention of in 1227. On his own scheme the word is superfluous, since no word of any previous witnesses occurs in the narrative.

disciple who follows Jesus into the place of trial; another disciple, who is probably to be identified with the 'beloved disciple,' enters the high priest's palace, and, in virtue of his position there ('he was known to the high priest'), is able to introduce Peter. The estimate of this assertion depends upon the general view taken of the relation between the historical and the religious element in the Gospel; either (a) the anonymous disciple is the author, John (see vol. i. 880 f.), or (b) the authority to which the author refers, or (c) a purely ideal figure (cf. E. F. Scott, The Fourth Gospel, 1907, pp. 57, 144, etc., and, from the opposite side, Lepin's L'Origine du Quatrième Evangile, 341-398).

While the Synoptic Gospels make the entire proceedings before Pilate take place in the open air, the Fourth Evangelist makes Pilate repeatedly go between the Jews outside and Jesus inside the palace.* The attempts of the governor to save his prisoner are dramatically sharpened, if not multiplied; Jesus speaks far more than in the earlier accounts; and a certain superstitious fear is even attributed to Pilate as one result of these interviews (198).

The two private conversations between Pilate and Jesus (1833-38 198-11) bring out the Evangelist's conception of Christ's Kingdom as a reign of truth, not of political or military force. In dramatic juxtaposition, Pilate and Jesus, the representatives of world-power and heavenly power, are confronted, and Jesus meets the Roman governor with fronted, and Jesus meets the Roman governor with undaunted calmness, actually putting questions to him as One possessed of independent authority. He judges His judge, in fact.† The Evangelist uses his favourite form of dialogue in order to bring out this conception of the meaning of the crisis. Pilate, to him, is less culpable than the Jews. He is first impatient, but soon impressed by Jesus, and finally convinced of His innocence. The insolence and rancour of the Jews form a foil to his anxiety. and rancour of the Jews form a foil to his anxiety to release the prisoner, and the dramatic conversations between the governor and the accusers bring out the contempt felt by the former for the latter's intriguing spirit, but also the weakness of character upon which the Jews were clever enough to play. Threatening Pilate with high treason to the emperor Tiberius (cf. vol. i. 246°) if he acquits Jesus, they force his hand, until angry, like any weak man who is publicly forced to be disloyal to his convictions he hands over the prisoner to be his convictions, he hands over the prisoner to be

It is plausible to read, between the lines of this scene, the author's plea for the political innocence of Christians at the opening of the 2nd cent. (as in Luke's Gospel and Acts), and to this apologetic element may be added an emphasis on the malevolent instigation of persecution by the Jews (as at Polycarp's martyrdom in Smyrna), and a corresponding emphasis on the greater hopefulness of the Gentile mission. The Jesus of the Fourth Gospel's trial recognizes no duty of confession towards Judaism. While in the Synoptic Gospels towards Judaism. While in the Synoptic Gospels He confesses His Messiahship to the Sanhedrin, and is silent on it before Pilate, the reverse is the case in the Fourth Gospel (cf. 1 Ti 613). But even in describing and defending His mission before the governor, Jesus appeals not to him but to the world of sincere, elect souls, who are 'of the truth' (cf. 12<sup>201</sup>), Greeks or Jews, the latter having no precedence whatsoever. It is in this light, as Loisy points out, that Pilate's famous question, What is truth? must be read, not as the word of an inquirer, nor of melancholy regret, but as a reflexion of the half-contemptuous scepticism felt by some Roman authorities for the inconvenient enthusiasm of Christians, who persisted in taking seriously what no man of the world would allow to disturb his own conscience (cf. TRUTH).* of a man letting himself suffer for the sake of 'truth,' a chimera of the schools! As for the dramatic confession of the Jews, We have no king but Cæsar (1916), with its affectation of patriotism in order to get rid of the King of truth, what the author means to bring out, especially in the light of the crisis of 70 A.D., when Cæsar destroyed the Jewish State, is the abnegation by Judaism of its proper mission. That mission was spiritual.

Judaism was the sheath to a seed: if it ceased to enfold transcendent hope, it lost all meaning. What found its expression in the rejection of Christ was that renegade Judaism in alliance with the world which we know as Pharisaism. For Judaism to ally itself with Rome, with Herod, with any earthly dominion, is, for a race called on to uphold trust in God, to confess that in any real stress of need the recourse must be to material springs of power' (Julia Wedgwood, The Message of Israel, p. 302).

Three further points in the Johannine narrative demand a final word of notice. (a) Are the famous words *Ecce homo (105, cf. vol. i. 507) meant to represent Pilate, like Caiaphas (1145-22), as an involuntary prophet? This would be likely if *a**efa-rative were taken (with Nestle, *Einführung in das Griech. NT, 237 l.) in the sense of the Son of Man (cf. 13 314), an interpretation favoured by Grill (*Untersuchungen über die Entstehung des wierten Ecangeliums, pp. 49-50). We should then have a play upon words which literally meant, 'Behold the fellow!' or, 'Look at this poor wretch!'

(b) To whom does Jesus refer in the words (1011), 'He that delivered me to thee has the greater sin'? To Satan, to Judus, or to Caiaphas? Most probably it is the high priest who is in the author's mind. The previous words of the verse (cf. Coleridge's Table Talk, May 20, 1830) emphasize one cardinal idea of the Gospel, viz. that the fate of Jesus was due to the Divine will alone; the latter part of the verse reiterates the other conception of the Jews as more culpable than the Roman authorities (cf. A. R. Eagar in Expositor, July 1906, p. 33 f.).

(c) Is ixédus (193) intransitive or transitive? Did Pilate seat himself or Jesus on the tribunal? The latter rendering, supported by a tradition voiced in the Gospel of Peter and Justin Martyr (see vol. i. 678-), would give a good sense, Jesus being symbolically enthroned as the King of truth, and Pilate's irony really indicating the true position of his prisoner (so Loisy, after Professor Roberts, Expositor, 1893, 296 f., and others); but unfortunately the grammatical and psychological probabilities tell seriously against it.*

* Jn 1831.32 is the early Christian interpretation of what was necessary for several ordinary reasons. The Jews could not stone their false prophet to death with impunity. They preferred to make the Romans responsible for the death of Jesus, as well as to make that death more infamous in the eyes of the people. Besides, they had no witnesses to cast the first stones, after the breakdown of the evidence about the Temple saving. Compare Nestle's Einführung in das Griechische NT, p. 213.

† In v. 37 Jesus appeals to a higher court than that of Pilate As the Evangelist suggests, the verdict passed on Jesus had been subsequently reversed.

† 'That a Roman administrator capable of taking this sensible view of a case so dishonestly got up should nevertheless suffer his sense of justice to be overborne by the outcry of a threatening priesthood and a noisy populace, is indeed deplorable, but only too credible in that age of decay of the civil virtues' (Martineau, Seat of Authority in Religion, bk. v. ch. ii.).

TRIBE (φυλή) is used mostly in the special OT rense of an Israelitish tribe, composed of the descendants of one of the sons of Jacob. The prophetess Anna belonged to the tribe of Asher (Lk 20). The Messianus daims of tarms The Messianic claims of Jesus were strength ened by the fact that He sprang from the royal tribe of Judah (He 7th). Galilee comprised the territories allotted in OT times to the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali (Mt 43.4). The promise to the Twelve Apostles that they should judge the twelve tribes of Israel (Mt 19.6 Lk 22.6) may be regarded as an instance of the way in which Jesus sometimes expressed His teaching in the language sometimes expressed this teaching in the impease of popular appealyptic conceptions of the Kingdom of God (cf. Rev 7st.). Less probable is the explanation of Weiss, that 'their judging the twelve tribes is only the reverse side of their being sent to the twelve tribes, which are exposed to judgment just because the offer of salvation was made to them through the Apostles' (NT Theol., Eng. tr. i. 154). In Mt 24<sup>20</sup> (quoted from Zec 12<sup>12</sup>) 'tribe' has the wider sense of a branch of the human race.

JAMES PATRICK. TRIBULATION. - The Gr. word θλιψει (which means literally 'a pressing,' 'a pressing together,' pressure') is translated in the AV by the words 'tribulation,' 'affliction,' and 'anguish.' In every instance of its occurrence save one, viz. Jn 162, where the AV tr. 'anguish' is retained, the RV priferrally complete the term it ribulation.' uniformly employs the term 'tribulation.' verh θληθω occurs twice in the Gospels in Mk 39, where it describes the action of the crowd in thronging' Jeans; and Mt 714, where it represents 'the way that leadeth unto life' as being 'straitened' (τεθλιαμένη). In his Study of Words, Trench gives a very interesting account of the history of the Eng. word 'tribulation.' Derived from Lat. tribulum, the threshing instrument or harrow by means of which the corn was separated from the husks, tribulatio, the term applied to the process of separation, came to be used for the disciplinary ordeal of distress and adversity. The following grouping of passages indicates the various usages of the word in the Gospels:

1. In the Apocalyptic discourse 'tribulation' is declared to be in store for the Jewish nation (Mt 242, cf. Mk 1312). The necessity of this tribulation is emphasized (Mt 24°, Mk 137, Lk 21°), and the circumstances attending it are described in terrible and pathetic detail.

2. 'Tribulation' is announced by Jesus as the outward lot that awaits His disciples. (a) In the confusion and conflict that would sweep the nation on to the final catastrophe, the disciples were to be involved (Mt 24°). They would draw this relentless hostility on themselves in consequence of their testimony and activity as disciples. It behaved them to endure (imondress, v. 11) and prove themselves 'brethren and partakers in the tribulathemselves 'Drethren and partakers in the brious-tion, and kingdom, and patience (brough) which are in Jesus' (Rev 1º RV, cf. Ro 5º). (b) Similarly, but without reference to any particular ordeal, the disciples are warned about the treatment they must expect to meet with 'in the world' (Jn 16<sup>2</sup> . 2º). On account of their relation to Jesus, they would be subjected to this treatment. But their attitude ought to be one of 'good cheer' (Superire), 'The way that leadeth unto life' was, therefore, in the case of the disciples to prove 'straitened' (reflammen).

3. 'Tribulation' and persecution (διωγμός) 'be-cause of the word' are mentioned in the paralle of the Sower as the conditions which cause those to stumble straightway' that 'hear the word, and straightway with joy receive it, and have no root in themselves' (Mt 13<sup>21</sup>, Mk 4<sup>17</sup>). A mind only emotionally interested in the 'word,' that is say, as distinct from one intellectually and morally interested (Mt 13th, Mk 4th), is incapable of withstanding the emotional shock occasioned by tribulation and persecution. With his feelings sustained and refreshed by no continuous and immediate experience in relation to the 'word,' such a person cannot resist the assault upon them of actual harasaing events. See also SORROW, SUFFERING.

A. B. MACAULAY.

TRIBUTE is used in the Gospels in two distinct wenses. 1. The tribute-mancy (disparator, Mt 17242) was the Temple-tax levied on all male Israelites of twenty and upwards, to meet the cost of the daily burnt-offering and the other sacrifices offered in the name of the people, and for other objects of a public character. In the days of Nehemiah the amount was a third of a shekel (Neh 10<sup>22, 28</sup>), but in NT times it was half a shekel (Jos. Ant. XVIII. xix. 1), which was also the sum fixed in Ex 3011-12. It was collected in the month Adar, and was paid in money of the early Hebrew standard. The 'piece of money' (grartp) of Mt 17" was equal to a shekel (about 2s. 9d.), and so was sufficient to meet the Temple-tax for two persons. 2. The tribute to Crear ($\phi\text{post}$, $\phi\text{post}$, $\phi\text{post}$, $\phi\text{post}$, $\phi\text{post}$, $\phi\text{post}$, $\phi\text{post}$, and the politar (tributum capitis), from which only children and the politar (tributum capitis), from which only children capitis). and old men were exempt. The Roman authorities made use of the Jewish courts in collecting their revenue from these sources (Jos. BJ II. xvii. 1). It was the lawfulness of paying such taxes about which Jesus was questioned by His enemies (Mt 22<sup>17</sup> 1 Mk 12<sup>16</sup> Lk 20<sup>27</sup>). His reply gave no ground for the charge of forbidding their payment, which was afterwards brought against Him (Lk 23<sup>2</sup>).

TRINITY .- Our subject is the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in relation to Christ and the Gospels. We have to consider how far that great conception of God's being and nature is revealed or implied in the fact of Christ as presented in the Gospels and in the teaching of our Lord Himself.

I. The witness of our Lord's consciousness as revealed in the Gospels.—(i.) AS REGARDS HIMSELF. It was not our Lord's custom to take to Himself the names and titles to which He knew He had a right. The passage which exhibits this fact most clearly is that in which we had Him questioning His disciples, first as to the popular opinion, and then as to their own belief (Mt 18<sup>136</sup>, Mk 8<sup>276</sup>, Lk 9<sup>136</sup>). After St. Peter had made his great confession, our Lord charged the disciples to keep the truth which had just emerged, to them-melves. No doubt He desired to avoid the mistakes arising from the popular conceptions of the Messiah. He wished also to train the minds of the disciples. to lead them gently from truth to truth, so that spiritual experience might keep pace with knowledge. And yet our Lord's thoughts about Himself were loftier far than could be imagined from the mere names and titles which He acknowledged. When the passages which contain His statements about His own relation to Gosl and man are collected and viewed as a whole, they are found to imply claims which are far in advance of the first and more obvious meanings of the titles.

It is being more and more fully recognized by critical students of the life of Jesus that He certainly regarded Himself as the Messiah, and that the names and titles by which He described Himself and permitted others to describe Him are Messianic in their significance. But when this has been granted to the full, there remains a very large proportion of His self revelation unaccounted for Bousset considers that the reserve of our Lord on the subject of His Messiahahip was due to His deep sense of the linadequacy of the Hessianic title for that which He felt Himself to be (Assus, p. 175 ff., Eng tr.). And certain it is that, among all the conceptions which clustered round the Jewish multipation of the Messiah, hone is great enough, none deep enough, to correspond with the revelation of Himself which our Lord makes in the compela. (Researt, The elopment of Doctrine La Hastings' DB, Ext. Vol.; Charles, 'Enoch' and 'Enchabology' in vol. 1, also Briggs, The Messiah of the Gospolo. True, we have the great OT conceptions of the later lenish and of the Book of Daniel, and we have the latire repeated, and in some respects enlarged it the Sonatindes of Facch. In this probability pre-Christian work there is no amodeful picture of the Son of Men, which corresponds remarkable with certain passages in the Gospela. He is, as it seems regarded as pre-existent, was named in the presence of God before creation, and takes part to judgment. But there is no anticipation of that extraordinate union of earthly humiliation with transcendent relationship to God the Father which is the principal deliverance of our Lords consciousness concerning Henself. The truth is that the difficulty of representing that consciousness by means of the understood and recognized terms of the religion and theologs of the day was almost inconcernable great.

It was this very inadequacy of all existing con ceptions to convey the truth of our Lord's Person in His relation to God and man which rendered necessary that careful and patient handling of the faith of the disciples which we find everywhere in his dealing with them. A spiritual experience of a new kind had to be created before the new language could be learned. The new wine needed new bottles. The first danger to be guarded against was a premature precision, a hasty definition. The one title which our Lord constantly used of Himself, the Son of Man,' most skilfully avoided anything of the nature of definition. Messianic in its associations, it was yet not so distinctively Messianic as to constitute a claim, and it was capable of infinite suggestion, according to its application and context. It was a continual challenge to reflexion. See art. SON OF MAN above and in Hastings' IIII.

These reflexions will help us to discern the true nature of the problem which is presented by our Lord's revelation of Himself. The facts of that problem may be summarized as follows, the Synoptic vidence and that of the Fourth Gospel being ex hibited separately.

(1) Direct statements or claims to a nontion or authority more than human,-The strongest passage in the Synoptics is the solemn declaration recorded by Mt (117) and Lk. (1071), 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father, and no one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father; and who the Father is, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him."

These words form the most striking connecting link between the Christology of the Synoptes and that of the Fourth Gospel. But they do not, as some critics would have us believe, standalone. On the contrary, they but sam up teaching which may be found everywhere, expressed or implied. In many places our Lord speaks of His mission from tool in a manner which sets Him above and apart from then (Mt. 2029, Mk 997 1005, Lk 200, Mt. 204 etc.). He is King in a superluman sense of the term (Mt. 2200, 250-40), Mk 163, Lk 100-60-220-250-25). He is Judge of all and Lord of the future (Mt. 2200, 1007 1009, Mk 100, 130-81, 120-904, Mk 100, 130-81, 120-904, Mk 100, 130-81, 120-904, Mk 100-904, Mk

In the Fourth Gospel this great claim of Christ occupies a much larger space, and is more explicit and more fully stated, but it is a mistake to suppose that it is more strongly expressed. Such a passage as Jn 5<sup>22, 23</sup> 'He hath given all judgment unto the Son; that all may honour the Son even as they honour the Father, is very definite, but it is only putting into general terms the teaching of Mt 10<sup>27</sup> 25<sup>218</sup>, Mk 8<sup>24-28</sup>, Lk 14<sup>25</sup>. The tremendous statement in Jn 10<sup>20</sup> I and the Father are one, summing up as it does the teaching of the whole Gospel, finds perhaps its most perfect explication in Mt 11<sup>-7</sup>, Lk 10<sup>28</sup>. The great section, Jn 14-17, is but the further development of the same doctrine, introducing, as was necessary, the promise of the Holy Spirit and certain fundamental instruction concerning His function and work.

(2) When from direct statements made by our Lord Hinnelf we pass to the revelation of His consciousness of His unique relation to God which is to be found implied in Hos life and methods, we are able to note the following:

(a) The unranging tone of authority which characterizes all His actions and utterances authority as regards the greatest subjects which have ever engaged the mind of man. See, further, artt. AUTHORITY OF CHRIST and CLAIMS OF CHRIST.

(b) The serene certainty of His judgments upon greatest questions of inscaling and religion. This characteristic is most noticeable in the Sermon on the Monnt, and in all those parts of His teaching which deal with His own relation to God, and God's love to man. All the highest and greatest things are to Hum easy and familiar He walks upon the mountain peaks of vision with unhesitating confidence. He speaks as One who sees clearly into the heart of God. Characteristics which would be incompatible in any one else unite freely and with perfect consistency in H.m. which inspired the various accounts could have made such a result possible. See, further, artt. Character of Christ, Divinity of Christ, MENTAL CHARACTERISTICS.

(ii.) HIS RELATION TO THE FATHER .-- (1) Our Lord asserts and implies that He stands in a relation of unique intimacy with God the Father. great passage already quoted (Mt 11<sup>37</sup>, Lk 10<sup>22</sup>) is the fullest statement in the Synoptics. The language here associates the Son with the Father in a manner which exalts Him above all creation. It corresponds with certain characteristic phrases and mental habits of our Lord. For example, He calls God 'my Father' in a manner which sets the relation indicated by the words far apart from that Fatherhood which He attributes to God in relation to men, whether disciples or not: see Mt  $7^{21}$   $10^{22}$ .  $3^{21}$   $11^{22}$   $15^{13}$   $18^{10}$   $20^{22}$  etc., Mk  $8^{38}$ , Lk  $2^{49}$   $22^{29}$   $24^{49}$ , Jn  $5^{17}$   $10^{29}$ .  $3^{20}$   $14^{20}$   $20^{17}$  etc. These passages but supply the correlative to the announcement at the Baptism and the Transfiguration (Mk 1<sup>11</sup> 9<sup>7</sup>). They also interpret for us the title 'Son of God' attributed to Him and accepted by Him (Mt 4<sup>2.6</sup> 8<sup>29</sup> 14<sup>38</sup> 27<sup>40.43.54</sup>, Mk 3<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>5.6</sup> 15<sup>20</sup>, Lk 4<sup>41</sup> 22<sup>70</sup>, Jn 1<sup>24.40</sup> 9<sup>25</sup> 11<sup>27</sup> etc.). In connexion with this we observe the cloudless serenity of His relation to God. It has been remarked that the absence of any note of repentance is the strongest proof of our Lord's perfect sinessness. But we have in His life the marks of the correlative to the announcement at the Baptism sinlessness. But we have in His life the marks of a moral state which is very much more than mere sinlessness. The value of the negative is entirely relative to the corresponding positive. The perfect innocence of a soul which possessed but small moral capacity would, so far as we can see, be of but little value as a moral factor in the universe. But, in the case of our Lord, we find a moral But, in the case of our Lord, we find a moral capacity which is absolutely without parallel in human experience, and we find the moral Being who possesses this capacity not merely conscious of innocence, but living a life which is wittingly and willingly all that God would have it be (see Forrest, op. cit., Lect. I.).

(2) Unity with the Father.—The revelation which our Lord gives us of His relation to the Father amounts to much more than a manifestation of a peculiar intimacy between Himself and tion of a peculiar intimacy between Himself and God. He claims distinctly certain Divine attributes and privileges. He is King and Judge of all. He is to be the object of the most absolute trust, the utmost devotion. No sacrifice is too great to be made for His sake (see above). reject Him or His messengers is to reject God and to incur the severest judgment (Mt 10<sup>15, 40</sup> 11<sup>22, 24</sup>, Mk 12<sup>9</sup>, Lk 10<sup>13, 14, 16</sup> 13<sup>34, 35</sup> etc.). The right of the Almighty to supremacy over the hearts and lives of the proposed in the severe of the series and lives of men could not be expressed in stronger terms than those in which Jesus claims human allegiance. The only possible explanation of His attitude is that given by His own words, 'All things have been delivered unto me of my Father'

When we turn to the Fourth Gospel, we find this teaching expressed with a fulness and clearness of statement which ought not to appear extraordinary. There must surely have been an inner side to such a life as we find portrayed from the outside in the Synoptics. If the external accounts give so many indications of a unique relation to God, the revelation of the inner life of the wonderful Personality must display that relation with special clearness. What is truly extraordinary is that the inner history, as we have it in St. John's Gospel, does not reveal any essential element which cannot be found, expressed or implied, in the external histories (see above). And this is the more remarkable when we consider that the method and style of the Fourth Gospel contrast so strongly with those of the others.

From St. John we learn then to think of our Lord: (1) As One who came from God, with whom He was before, on a mission of mercy to mankind, Jn 311-14 16 17. 317. 524. 30. 43 629. 22. 331. 62 716. 26 etc. 322. 42 etc. [626f.]. (2) As One whose relation to the Father is essential and unique, 313. 18. 34 517. 18. 23. 26 657 816 1016. 38 147. 11. (3) As the only-begotten Son of God, 316. 18, and see 114. 18 (in v. 18 the stronger paragraphs size seems the better reading). (4) As with the Father from all eternity. This may be gathered from 826 Before Abraham was, I am,' and 175. 24 the glory which I had with thee before the world.' These passages justify the extraordinary language of the Prologue (11. 2), 'the Word was with God,' the same was in the beginning with God' (rpic vio sis). The ipic sim of 856 certainly implies more than mere pre-existence. (5) As one with the Father: 'I and the Father are one' (1030); 'All things whatsoever the Father hath are mine' (1619); 'All things whatsoever the father hath are mine' (1619); 'All things that are mine are thine, and thine are mine' (1710), etc. The is (one) in 1030 is very remarkable. It signifies essence, as distinguished from person, which would be if. The force of it is greatly strengthened by its relation to the context. Our Lord is declaring His power to keep His people. He appeals to the Almighty power of God (v. 29), identifying His own power with it and adding the explanation, 'I and the Father are one.' See also 517 128 147-10 etc.

This classification of passages enables us to pass along an ascending plane of thought to that great doctrine which is so comprehensively and yet so briefly expressed in the Prologue to the Gospel. We learn that the Evangelist intended us to gather that the conception of the Logos which is there presented is the true and necessary implication of our Lord's consciousness of Himself and His work in relation to God and the world!

II. The revelation of God in the Gospels.—
(i.) THE FATHER.—We must never forget that (i.) THE FATHER.—WE must here some Christianity was built upon the foundation of Jewish monotheism. A long providential discipline had secured to the Jewish people their splendid heritage of faith in the One and Only God. 'Hear, O Israel, Jehovah our God is one Jehovah: and thou shalt love Jehovah thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might' (Dt 6st.). This was the corner-stone of the religion of Israel. These were perhaps the most familiar of all sacred words to the ears of the pious Jew. They were recited continually. Our Lord Himself had them frequently in His mind (Mt 22<sup>37</sup>, Mk 12<sup>29, 30</sup>, Lk 10<sup>27</sup>). That He thought of God always as the Supreme One is unquestionable. Indeed the very idea of Fatherhood, which, with our Lord, is the characteristic conception, and which is capable of being presented in a way which might weaken or injure a true monotheigh. which might weaken or injure a true monotheism, becomes in His teaching absolutely monotheistic because absolutely universal (see Mt 5<sup>45, 48</sup> 7<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>11</sup> 10<sup>29</sup>, Lk 6<sup>35</sup> 13<sup>29, 30</sup> 15). To the Jewish mind, the sovereignty of God was the natural and characteristic thought. In our Lord's teaching the Divine Fatherhood overshadows and also transforms the Divine sovereignty, but never threatens to dissolve the pure and splendid monotheism of the original doctrine.

There are three degrees of the Divine Fatherhood presented in the teaching of our Lord: God is the universal Father (see reff. given above); He is, in a very intimate and special way, the Father of the disciples of Jesus (Mt 5<sup>16</sup> 6<sup>1.8</sup> 10.8 10.7 11, Lk 12<sup>32</sup> etc.); He is, in the highest, and unique, sense, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (see above).

It is evident that our Lord makes a very clear distinction between His own Sonship and the relationship in which others, even the most faithful of disciples, stand towards God. Yet, in thus setting Himself apart as the Son of God, He was in truth providing that very element which was required to form a connecting link between the Divine and the human. The great danger of monotheism is its tendency towards a transcendence which removes man to an infinite distance: God and man seem to stand apart from one another in hopeless opposition. Such was the tendency of the Jewish conception in the time of our Lord. (See art. 'God (in NT)' by Dr. Sanday in Hastings' DB).

We find them that the tending of our Lord.

We find, then, that the teaching of our Lord and of the Gospels concerning God is the union of a true and unwavering monotheism with a great doctrine of mediation, according to which God and man enter into very close relationship in the Person of Jesus Christ, the Son of God.

(ii.) THE SON.—(1) The Son is a distinct Person from the Father. It is easy to complicate this question by a discussion of the meaning of the word personality.' The Latin word persona was chosen to represent the Greek ἐπόσπασα, but neither the original nor its translation was adequate. Το endeavour to minimize the difficulty of the traditional doctrine by recalling the primitive meaning of persona is surely vain. The truth is that the conception of personality, as we now understand it, did not enter into the thoughts of the ancients. at all. They used the language which attached itself most easily to the new distinctions which the rise of Christian theology forced upon their atten-tion, and, in doing so, laid the foundations of our modern philosophical and theological terminology. But the true force of their technical terms may be more accurately gauged by considering the meanings to which they tended, than by going back to meanings which they forsook. It is much better to interpret the Trinitarian doctrine with the help of the modern conception of personality than by means of the Latin word persona; for if the con-notation of the term has altered, its denotation is, in this case, the same, and the change of meaning was simply the inevitable development. The truth of this will become evident when we turn from abstract doctrines and a priori arguments to the facts of the life of Christ as we have them in the Gospela. If any result has emerged from our examination it is this: the Personality of our Lord is the most distinct and the most concrete of which we have any knowledge. If His consciousness included elements which are outside the range of our experience, if His character com-bined qualities which do not coexist under ordinary human conditions, if there was an unexampled completeness about His moral and spiritual being then all these great spiritual possessions belonged to His Ego, and therefore that Ego had a distinctness and concreteness surpassing any other human being who ever lived. To confuse the boundaries which give the Ego its distinctness, for the sake of making an abstract doctrine appear more intelligible, is surely a dangerous error. Our Lord was very man, and His Ego had all the self passession and self consciousness which give to every human soul its personal distinctness. While we find, in His self revelation, that He constantly entered into a communion with God which is quite without parallel in human experience, and that He knew the heart of God from within, we also find Him ever distinguishing Hunself as a Person from the Father. There is no trace anywhere of the break ing down of the boundaries of personal life. The Hebrew prophet was frequently impelled to speak as the mouthpiece of Jehovah, his personality seemed to dissolve, and the voice of Deity seemed to speak through his lips. So with the mystic, the individual being seems to vanish in the moment of insight, the human drop seems to blend with the ocean of Divinity. In the records of the inner life of our Lord will be found no sign of such experiences. His utterances reveal no displacement of the centre of personal life. He is always selfcontained, even in Gethsemane.

Contained, even in trecusemane.

This personal distinctness may be seen clearly in the following passage a. They are among our Lord's greatest utterances. "All things have been delivered unto me of my Father, and no one knoweth the Son save the Father, etc. (Mt 147-1a 1627). "The Bon of Man shale come in the glory of his Father with his angels (Mt 1627). "Whosnes er shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adv. trous and sinful generation the Son of Man also shall be ashamed of his made in the sale, trous and sinful generation the Son of Man also shall be ashamed of him, when he come in the glory of his Father with the hole angels (Mk 828). Not what I will, but what the right (Mk 1628). "Ye God my God why has thou forsaken me?" (Mk 1628). "My Father worketh hitherto and I work. (In 627). "I am the Eather are now (1628), "I am the war, and the truth, and the lafe no one cometh into the Father but by me? (148), etc. These examples are selected out of a great number. The Fourth Gospal is especially rich to such passages, and this fact is the more remarkable because it is the Gospel of Christian mysticism. In it we are taught to think of the great unities which are realized in Christ. Thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us?, 'I in them and thou in the, that they may be perfected into one \(\forall (173^2 28)\), etc. Yet 8t. John is very clear as to the distinctness of the Persons. 'The Logos was with tood,' 'The same was in the beginning with tood' (1-2). The phrase is remarkable, \(\tau_{ext} \text{vio.} \text

(2) Organic relation of the Son to the Father.— (a) The subordination of the Son. This truth is presented everywhere in the teaching of our Lord. Though He speaks ever as One who enjoys a unique relation of intimacy with the Father, though He claims God as His own Father, yet it is clear that He was filled with reverence towards the Eternal Source of all things from whom His own being is

Source of all things from whom His own being is derived.

Certain pamages express this very distinctly: Mk 13<sup>22</sup> (of that day and that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son, but the Father! These words are usually considered in connents with the doctrine of the kenosit (who see). But they are quite as important as a testimony to our Lord's consciousness of His own Pivine Sonahy. Here we find Him placing Himself above the angels in heaven, next to the Eternal Father and the foot of this agnorance of the great secret noted as extraordinary. The truth is that the implications of this passage involve a Christology who hagrees perfectly with the teaching of SI John. There is, however, the Jear assertion of the subordination of the Son, and even if His ignorance of the great day be regarded as temporary, part of the limitation involved in His humiliation while on earth, none the less the assertion remains.

Secondly, especial mention may be made of In 14<sup>25</sup> 'The Father is greater than I.' As Coleridge observes (see Table Talk, ist. May 1823), these words, which have been used to supply an argument against the orthodox creed, contain, in truth, a very strong implication of our Lord's Divinity. For a mere name to say, 'God in greater than I,' would be monstrome or absurd. Comparison is possible only between things of the same nature. While, therefore, the assertion implies the Divinity, it is a direct statement of the fillial subordination of the Son. It is remarkable that, in this statement our Lord uses the emphatic' I,' as in 5<sup>26</sup> (720 × 500 may, 'the Son' or, the Son' of Mar. It is madin asible as Westerit points out it suppose that He aspeaking here of acre we see that 'in the fulness of His nature by Personality. We cannot took that the statement refers increb to the human life of Christ on earth. 'The superior greatness of the Father must therefore be interpreted in regard to the absolute relations of the Father and the Son without to lation of the one equal Godliead' (See Wester

(b) The derivative nature of the Son's Divinity -We are left in no doubt as to what is the essential nature of this subordination. The Son derives His being, His knowledge, His power, His active life, at every moment, from the Father. For the de-tailed proof of this we are mainly dependent upon the Fourth Gospel. But here the range of passages which may be adduced is extraordinary.

"The Son can do nothing of himself' (Jn 519), "As the Father hath I is in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in himself' (v. 29), "I can of mixelf do nothing (v. 29). "I an come down from heaven, not to do more cwn will, "a 1 the well of him that sent me "(029). I do n 40 mg of mixelf (v. 29). "I spoke not from noyelf, but the Father which wint me he half given n a commandment, what I should say and what I should speak" (1229), "The Father abiding in me doeth his works" (1419), "Thou, Father art in me, and I in thee (1779).

(c) The Lemmas -It is this derivative nature of the Son's Divinity which helps us to realize that the limitations to which He submitted during His life on earth involved no breach of His Divine identity. Our ordinary experience teaches us that the limitation of our powers does not destroy our identity. If we shut our eyes, we impose upon ourselves voluntarily a limitation which, while it lasts, diminishes very considerably our hold upon reality; yet we continue to be the same identical persons that we were before, and that we shall be again when the voluntary Limitation has come to an end But it is hard to imagine anything similar in the case of the Eternal Source of all being. All that is depends on Him, and any reduction or limitation of His power is inconceivable. Certainly that would seem to be the case, when we think of the Eternal Father. But surely it is different with the Eternal Son. His Divinity is derivative, dependent from moment to moment upon the Father: and therefore there is no difficulty in accepting what seems to be a necessary inference from the facts of the Gospel history, that, during our Lord's life on earth, there took place a limitation of the Divine effluence. Nor is it necessary to suppose that this limitation was always the same in extent or degree. Here may be the explanation of the awful cry, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' Such a view is not inconsistent with the declaration of St. Paul that 'it was the good pleasure of the Father that in him should all fulness dwell,' the whole πλήρωμα of the Deity (Col 1<sup>19</sup>).

(d) The Logos.—For the use of this term in Christian theology we are indebted to St. John. It is a mark of the inner truth of the Fourth Gospel that nowhere is our Lord represented as using it; for it is not in His manner, nor does it arise naturally out of the thought of the first age of Christian experience (but see Rev 19<sup>13</sup>). It belongs essentially to the age of reflexion and philosophic construction. Yet the term was familiar to the minds of thinkers of various schools at the time. It was the means of drawing together the religious thought of Palestine and the philosophy of Alexandria. In the former, the Memra or Word of Jehovah was regarded as a quasi-personal Divine agency by which the Most High effects His purposes in the world. In the latter, the Logos is a personified abstraction, and must be connected with the Immanent Reason of Greek speculation, though sometimes conceived more concretely (by Philo) as executive power. (See Harnack, Hist. of Dogma, ch. ii. § 5, etc., and throughout, for further development of the Logos conception). See, further, art. Logos.

Both speculatively and historically the Incarnation is the starting-point for that course of thought which leads inevitably to the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity. As soon as Christian thinkers came to realize that the Christ is the Son of God as being the Incarnate Divine Logos, their thought was launched upon that vast speculation as to the nature of God, and especially as to the relation of the Son to the Father, which occupied the minds of theologians during the earlier centuries of Church history.

(iii.) THE HOLY GHOST.—For a general statement of the doctrine of the Holy Spirit the reader may be referred to art. HOLY SPIRIT in vol. i. and the corresponding art. in Hastings' DB. Here a briefer and more limited treatment must suffice.

(1) The evidence of the Synoptic Gospels.—The Gospels record a renewed activity of prophetic inspiration in connexion with the Advent of Christ. Of John the Baptist it was foretold, 'He shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb' (Lk 1<sup>10</sup>). So we read (vv.<sup>41.67</sup>) of Elisabeth and Zacharias, that, filled with the Spirit, they uttered prophetic language. See also Lk 2<sup>25.32.37.38</sup>. Again, the miraculous conception is ascribed to the operation of the Spirit (Lk 1<sup>26</sup>, Mt 1<sup>18.20</sup>). Equally clear is the statement of the agency of the Holy Spirit at the Baptism of our Lord (Mk 1<sup>10</sup>, Mt 3<sup>16</sup>, Lk 3<sup>22</sup>). As He entered upon His ministry, the Evangelists tell us that our Lord was guided by the Holy Spirit (Mk 1<sup>12</sup>, Mt 4<sup>1</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1.2.14.18</sup>). His miracles are performed in the Spirit (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>). In His hour of most profound concentration upon the mystery of His own Person and work we are told, 'He rejoiced in the Holy Spirit' (Lk 10<sup>21</sup>).

Our Lord's own teaching on this subject, as given in the Synoptics, recognizes the inspiration of the OT (Mk 12<sup>26</sup>, Mt 22<sup>25</sup>), and connects His own miraculous works (Mt 12<sup>26</sup>) and His mission (Lk 4<sup>16</sup>) with the agency of the Holy Spirit. Certain of His promises to His disciples can be fully understood only in the light of the teaching which we find in the Fourth Gospel. See Mt 10<sup>20</sup>, Lk 11<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>12</sup> 24<sup>46</sup>, Ac 1<sup>4</sup> 5. Perhaps, however, the strongest passage of all is that in which our Lord warns against the awful sin against the Holy Ghost (Mk 3<sup>26</sup>, Mt 12<sup>26</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>). The intensity of our Lord's language here certainly points to the Deity of the Spirit. See, further, art. UNPARDONABLE SIN.

ABLE SIN.

(3) The Personality of the Holy Ghost.—It is inevitable, owing to the very use of the ambiguous word πνεῦμα, that in many cases it is impossible to be certain, from the mere language of the passages in which the word occurs or from their context, as to the nature of the agency to which reference is made. It is also necessary to remember that the personification of abstractions may be carried to great lengths when the conception of personality is indefinite, as it certainly was among the ancients, at least to a far greater degree than at present. It would, therefore, be a mistake to infer the Personality of the Holy Spirit from the mere use of language concerning Him which seems to imply it. Such language must be understood in relation to the whole Christian revelation and its interpretation in terms of thought. Yet the language is very strong and very definite. 'I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Paraclete, that he may be with you for ever; even the Spirit of truth (14<sup>16, 17</sup>). The Spirit is here indicated as 'another, One who is to take the place of our Lord Himself as His substitute. Also He is δ παράκλητος, τδ πνεθμα τὸ ἄγιον (v.26). The masculine form of the word is certainly used to impress upon the disciples the truth that the Presence which is to take the place of that to which they had been accustomed is no less a Personal Presence than the other. And this less a Personal Presence than the other. And this view is strengthened by the repeated and emphatic ἐκεῦνος: 'he shall teach you' (v. 26); 'he shall bear witness' (1526); 'he, when he is come, will convict . . .' (166); 'he shall guide you . . .' (v. 13); 'he shall glorify me' (v. 14). Not merely the language, strong and emphatic as it undoubtedly is, but the whole argument demands the doctrine of the Personality of the Spirit.

This group of passages also shows very clearly.

This group of passages also shows very clearly that we are here taught to think of the Spirit as not only personal, but as distinct from the Father and the Son. This appears remarkably in 14. The Paraclete, the Holy Spirit, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring to your remembrance all that I said unto you. Again in 15. Whom I will send unto you from the Father, even the Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, he shall bear witness of me. Language could not make the distinctness of the Persons clearer. Yet strong and clear as this teaching is, we find its strength and clearness greatly increased by the fact that it fits into the scheme of Christian thought as we find that scheme developing in the Epistles of St. Paul and taking more rounded dogmatic form in the later ages of Christian reflexion.

(4) The Divinity of the Holy Ghoet .- We can have no doubt on this subject when we have reached the point at which we attain the conviction that, in His great discourse, our Lord teaches us unmistakably the Personality of the Spirit as distinct from that of the Father and of the Son. The Three Persons are here viewed upon a plane of being which is above that of all created things.

In Jn 1416-18 20 1520 1614-15 the inter-relationship of the Divine His duciples in this great discourse.

Such teaching certainly implies both the Divinity and the Unity of the Three Persons, which throughout are at once distinguished, regarded as inseparably united, and placed upon a plane of being far above all created existence.

III. Summary .- (1 ) THE BAPTISMAL FORMULA. -We have omitted from our consideration one great passage of first-rate importance on every branch of our subject. It has been kept to the last because it is the nearest thing to a comprehonsive and formal statement of the doctrine of the Trimty to be found in Holy Scripture. In Mt 2815-20 there is, as the last word of that Gospel. a solemn charge which it is stated our Lord gave to His disciples when they not Him, by His special command, after His resurrection. The charge includes: (1) a declaration of His incorrect outlinedy, *All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and in earth, containing a very strong implication of His Divinity and agreeing with Mt 11<sup>27</sup> and Lk 1022 as well as with the teaching of the Fourth Gospel. (2) A great commission, 'Go ye therefore and make disciples of all the nations, haptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you. words which are at once the greatest command, the greatest prophecy, and the greatest dogmato mtatement ever given (3) A promise, 'Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. which has been a source of power and inspiration to the Church ever since.

to the Church ever since.

It is true that this passage belongs to a part of St. Matthew a Compel which has been assaled with great persistence, and in internal grounds, with some apparent reason. It is often argued that the Erist coupel contains many additions to the Evangels narrative which arose from the babts of thought and practive, as well as from explanatory teading, current of the primitive Church. The associant of laptism given here would then be a reflexion of the teaching of a later time Against thus, we have to note that there is no textual evidence against thus, we have to note that there is no textual evidence to the mind of the Christian Church at a time which was earlied to the mind of the Christian Church at a time which was earlied times as continuous stream of testimony from the earliest times as to baptism into the threefold name the Indiach; proving the connecting link between the Aposidic age and Listin Martic But stronger than all these is the fact that this passage treats und to death as a few passage treats on detail may be found watered throughout the four Goopels. It is a rely somewhat hand to suppose that the Christian doctrine. It is a rely somewhat hard to suppose that the Christian doctrine of God could have so capidly assumed the form in which we flod it in St. Paul's Equities, if our Lord Hunsel's had not brought together the various strands of His teaching, and when was this so likely to happen as when He manifested Himself to His disciples after His resurrection? The truth is that this passage in Mi. supplies exactly the due we need in order to understand the rapid development of doctrine and the continuity of custom in the early Church. (See Banday in art 'Gool in Hastings' BB in p. 213, and his Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, p. 21a; also Scott in art. 'Trinity' in DB, Ext. Vol. p. 31a). But there is this further proof of genumeness, that the language here possesses all the power, conventration, and authority which have everywhere the marks of the true sayings of Jesus. There is not a word in this utterance, from which to authority which has not been, in all ages, a source of life to the Church. Here the meaning of the life, death, and teaching of the Son of God is translated into a language which appeals to the numbs and of the Gospels. Moreover, the prophecy here contained is ofto large a scale to have arisen naturally out of the life of the Christian community of the lit century. Not even to 3t Paul was granted so wide an outlook upon the history of markind. This great vision of a world wide Christianity belongs to the mind of Him who spoke of the Grain of Mustard Seed and the Draw-Net, and taught His disciples to pray, 'Thy kingdom come.'

We may, unless our judgments are obscured by critical prejudices, turn to this passage as supplying the needful summary of all those thoughts about God which we have gleaned from the teaching of Christ and the Gospels. The expression els vo Ground is important: Christian Baptism is to be 'into the name.' The phrase recalls the language of the UT in which the 'Name' of God stood for Himself as revealed or brought into relation to menname Jehorah was the sign or mark of the old covenant. Can we fail to gather that the name which marks the new covenant is that of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost! In this name is contained the revelation of God which Christ brought to It must also be observed that the word is singular, 70 deoms, suggesting the unity of the Godhead. The name is threefold, yet it is one.

The doctrine of the Trinity is, then, the summing up of the teaching concerning God which is contained or implied in the Christian revelation. is not a philosophic construction. It is not the outcome of abstract discussion upon the Being and attributes of God. In its origin it had nothing to do with logical or dialectical methods, nor did it do with logical or malectival metalogy, arise out of the efforts of the understanding. Its source is simply the fact of Christ Himself. amazing and, to the merely scentile intelligence, most mysterious fact, which still, after so many centuries, presents to mankind the old question, Who say ye that I am? is the revelation of the franty, desas Christ manifests tool as kather, Trunty. Jesus Chris Son, and Holy Ghost.

(a) THE ILLUMINATING POWER OF THE DOC-TRINE When from the position which has now been attained we look back over the lite teaching of our Lord, we find that sudden light is thrown upon much that otherwise seems obscure. It is this reflex illumination of Christian experience which constitutes the verification of the doctrine a verification which may be truced throughout the whole history of the Church, and which to this day may be discerned in the vitality of orthodox Christianity and its continued value for the religious consciousness of mankind in contrast with Deisni in all its forms. Here we confine our brief survey Annucation the angel replies to the Virgin's question (Lk 12). The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Wost High shall over-hadow thee - wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God . At the Baptism the three Divine Persons are represented. 'He saw the heavens rent asunder and the Spirit as a dove descending upon him, and a voice came out of the heavens. Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased (Mk 110-11, also Mt 38-17, Lk 371-27). At the Transfiguration the glory of the Son and His relation to the Father are manifested (Mk 97, Mt 175, Lk 925)

TRINITY TRINITY 765

But more profound even than such indications as these is the truth that the doctrine of the Trinity underlies the whole movement of Divine providence for the redemption and elevation of man as we have it presented in the NT. Here it is sufficient to note that everywhere in the Gospels, while God the Father is regarded as the ultimate source of all things, both in creation and in redemption, certain special functions are declared to belong to the Son and the Spirit, and yet there is no separation or opposition between the Divine Persons. God the Father is the Creator, yet all things were made rather is the Creator, yet at things were made by (διά) the Logos, και χωρίς αὐτοῦ έγένετο οὐδὲ ἐν δ γέγονεν (Jn 1³). Redemption is the work of the Son :
'The Son of Man came to seek and to save that which was lost, (Lk 19<sup>10</sup>). He came 'to give his life a ransom for many' (Mk 10<sup>45</sup>, Mt 20<sup>23</sup>). He is the Shepherd seeking the lost sheep (Lk 15<sup>3-7</sup>). But the love which surrounds the sinner from his birth, which remains constant throughout his life of sin, and which receives him into a perfect reconciliation on his repentance, is the love of the Father (Lk 15<sup>115</sup>.). Further, the salvation which is the result of the death of Christ is everywhere presented as the work of God Himself. Thus is the love of God revealed in Christ, and assurance as regards God's mind and will towards us attained. The unity of Atonement. So again, the works of Christ are 'in the Spirit' (Mt 12<sup>28</sup>), and the Spirit is called by Christ 'the Spirit of your Father' (Mt 10<sup>20</sup>). The Son is the means of communication between man and the Father (Mt 1127, Lk 1022, Jn 146 etc.), yet the Spirit is the source of the life which makes this communication possible (Jn 33-6). Further, the Spirit is the gift of the Father (Lk 1138), and none can come to the Son unless the Father draw him (Jn 644). It is sufficient to point out, finally, how closely interrelated are the functions of the Three Persons as described in Jn 14-16. The coming of the Paraclete is identified with a coming of the Son (14<sup>18</sup>), and the coming of the Son with a coming of the Father (vv. <sup>9, 23</sup>). His office is to carry on the work of the Son, which is the work of the Father (16<sup>14-15</sup>), in the Church (14<sup>17th</sup> etc.) and in the world (168) after the departure of the Son. It is commonly said that the characteristic work of the Father is creation, of the Son redemption, of the Holy Chost sanctification. The distinction is certainly Scriptural, and yet there is no one of these works in this plant of the Division Power bearing the country of the Power bearing the in which each of the Divine Persons has not a share. The Trinity in Unity is, to use the old-fashioned language, both ontological and economical.

And all this has its counterpart in the Christian experience of our own time, for Christianity is, for the Church and for the individual, the revelation of the Fatherhood of God through and in that Christ who presents Himself afresh to every age as the manifestation of the love of God, and whose personal influence, in some mysterious manner, survives every shock of revolution as well

(iii.) THE PHILOSOPHICAL ASPECT. - This is not the place to consider the great question as to how far the doctrine of the Trinity can commend itself to, or be justified by, the philosophical reason of mankind. The problem is as old as Christian theology, and is latent in all discussions which touch the life of the Christian creed. If it has not been greatly canvassed, at least directly, in recent times, it is because all the resources of Christian thought have been devoted to a work which has been in truth more pressing, the endeavour to grasp more firmly and to realize more perfectly the facts to which the Scriptures testify, the elements of the great revelation upon which the doctrine depends. When the time for full discussion comes, there is at least a probability that the general mind will be prepared. The old objection that the doctrine is apparently contra-dictory, that it cannot be made logically consistent, is certainly losing its plausibility. All the lines of thought which have guided so many in the direction of Agnosticism have converged upon this: that there must be an element of mystery in the nature of God. The old Deistic conception of a solitary Sovereign in the skies, standing above and apart from creation, is now impossible for the in-structed. The doctrine of the Trinity stands in truth midway between Agnosticism and Deism. With the former it recognizes the impossibility of presenting to our minds the inmost nature of the Supreme One, with the latter it insists upon the absolute necessity of thinking of the Deity in terms of personality. But it keeps closer than either to the facts of the religious consciousness and the needs of humanity, because it builds upon actual experience, the experience which stands central in the history of the race, and it interprets this experience by means of the only perfect Personality known to man.

In addition to this general consideration, there are tendencies in recent thought which seem to promise new light on the old doctrine. Philosophy and psychology have both been dealing with the question of personality, and have been revealing the existence of problems of extraordinary complexity and suggestiveness in connexion with it. For both, human personality appears, from one point of view, as a self-sufficing unity, and, from another, as an illuminated portion of a vast world of spiritual existence. It is both inclusive and exclusive, both universal and limited, according to the way in which it is regarded, and no principle has yet come to light by means of which these oppositions can be shown to be overcome.

The more usual way of approaching the applicathe more usual way of approaching the approaching of the principle of personality to the doctrine of the Trinity is to follow the line indicated by Lotze (Microcosmos, bk. ix. ch. iv.) and regard personality as it exists in man as incomplete, perfect personality belonging to God only. If this conception be justifiable, we may well expect to be able to apply an ancient method and find that distinctions which we know to exist in man's personality. distinctions which we know to exist in man's personality may be correctly regarded as corresponding to distinctions of a much profounder degree in the Divine Being. The best modern exposition of this view is Illingworth's Personality, Human and Divine, a work which may justly be regarded as representing for our time the classic point of view, that of St. Augustine in his de Trinitate.

that of St. Augustine in his de Trinitate.

The difficulty which is inherent in this method was, however, clearly seen by Augustine himself, and it cannot be said that modern philosophers have been able to surmount it successfully. Regarding the distinctions in the Godhead as corresponding to the three, 'memory, understanding, love,' which we know of in ourselves, he yet perceives that 'Tria ista . . . mea sunt, non sua; nec sibi sed mihi agunt quod agunt, imo ego per illa,' and again, 'Ego per omnia illa tria memini, ego intelligo, ego diligo, qui nec memoria sum, nec intelligentia, nec dilectio, sed hasc habee. Ista ergo dici possunt ab una persona quas habet hesc tria, non ipsa est hasc tria' (de Trinitate, bk. xv. ch. xxii. § 42). Nor can it be said that Augustine or any of his successors in this great adventure, not even Hegel in his Philosophy of Religion, has been able to show how what in us is only the attribute, faculty, or thought of a persona, can become a Persona in the Deity.

There is however a nocklor line of thought in

There is, however, another line of thought in recent philosophy, which seems to the writer to promise much better results for the Christian thinker. Out of the Hegelian school have arisen some who, feeling the force of certain considerations relied on by Agnostic reasoners, hold that the nature of the Ultimate Reality is beyond us, our highest categories and our most concrete experiences being inadequate alike to express or to present it. In addition to this, there has been slowly gaining recognition the importance of the conception of degrees of reality. Bradley in his Appearance and Reality has done more than any other writer to call attention to this principle. For to theology, as he professes to be, he may prove its most useful ally. The work of Pringle-Pattison points in the same direction. Person ality may be, for human thought, the highest of all categories; but the existence of certain fundamental antinomies and oppositions, speculative and practical, proves clearly that it is not the ultimate form of being. There is a degree of Reality, a final Unity, higher, more concrete, than Personality There must be, because a person is, after all, essentially one among many. A person is what he is, not merely because he is inclusive as regards his own experience, but because he is exclusive as regards his neighbours' experience. Personality cannot therefore be a full definition of the Divine nature. God is personal and some thing more. In His final Unity He is super-personal, and this super-personal unity is the ultimate Reality, concrete and universal. Here is exactly the condition demanded by the Christian doctrine of the Trinity. The most complete monotheism is compatible with the recognition of a personal multiplicity in the Godhead.

TRUMPET.—The sole mention of the trumpet in the Gospels occurs in Mt.'s version of the small appealy se which has been incorporated in the eschatological discourse of Jesus There (Mt 242) we read that when the Son of Man comes in the clouds for the final judgment, He despatches His angels ' with a loud trumpet ' to gather His elect from the four corners of the earth. The context, especially in Mt., is a Jewish Christian application of the older Messianic tradition (cf. cg. 1827). Zec. 210 [LAX)) which deputed the scattered members of Israel being summoned together by a trumpet-blast at the Messiah's advent. The figure was natural, for the trumpet-blast denoted the approach of majesty. 'Power, whether spiritual or physical, is the meaning of the trumpet; and so, well used by Handel in his approaches to the Deity (1stagerald's Letters, i. 92). It was a favourite figure of John Knox, too, as Stevenson has noted in Men and Books). But it is rather as a rallying summons than as a herald of royalty or even an awakener of sleepers, that the trumpet is employed as a juctorial detail in the passage before us. The writer does not develop the sketch. We are not told who blows the trumpet, though possibly the angels were meant. St. Paul seems to reflect, in 1 Th 4th, the tradition which connected it with the archingel Michael, but Mt merely inserts the realistic trait, owing to his characteristic love of Hebrew Messianic prophers

*Weithausen argues that as 'the trimpet is singular, it rannot be connected with the angels but must be posited as a separate unit." This seems promise, "Trimpet amp has soon

TRUST. -That personal trust is the innermost essence of the faith that God requires, is almost universally recognized by Protestant theologians. Only in rare instances may one still meet with the pronounced intellectualistic view which regards faith as the assent to a sum of doctrines. On the other hand, one may note here and there a tendency towards the opposite extreme to ascribe a value to faith as a subjective state without special regard to the reality of its ground and content. But the one view is as un-Evangelical and un-Biblical as the other.

when Beliarmin (de Justif E. 4) declares "heretis fidem staterative come definitunt, Catholic fidem in intellecta sedem habere volunt," he states accurately enough the finialmental flatir from herween the Catholic and the Françeical incorption of faith, and yet in his discussion he between a fatal misapprehension concerning the latter. Protestant do define faith as statemat (trust) but this is not a bare and empty trust. The manis Americanum statema against which the Council of Trent impertmently protested. A trust that is merely subjective is indeed groundless and empty, and therefore wome than worthless (cf. 16.0.18.179). Falls has no value per we take the second of the statematic field of t

When it is said that Christian faith is personal trust in God in and through Jesus Christ, one need not conclude that 'faith' and 'trust' are exactly equivalent terms. The thought is only that the deepest essence of faith is trust, and that there is no Christian faith that is not personal trust in God. An examination, however, of the passages in the NT in which these words occur will clearly show that even here - to say nothing of later ecclesinstical usage-faith, formally regarded, is the more comprehensive term

"Two factors (# ments) are to be distinguished in faith, one relating to the abject, the knowledge of God meshated O'r might thrist, the other relating to the state of the writest, the trust in which a resting upon thrist. But the two around be separated from each other is not the Christian knowledge of God arises on a mark with the trust in sacratio. To the distinction between these, two sides of faith correspond the two formulas not grant credition the context of faith and five quantities the attitude of faith. On it is all the kept more that the context of faith and five quantities the attitude of faith the context of a these primarily the context of faith and five quantities of the arise of the among revelation state (kind and collaboration of the maxing revelation state) (kind and collaboration of the maxing revelation state).

It is accordingly unwarrantable to speak of a purely intellectual faith in God. The mere 'a purely intellectual faith in God. The mere holding a doctrine to be true is not faith at all. Earlier dogmaticians divided the function of faith into three acts notitor. knowledge, instruction in the facts and doctrines of Christianity assurer, assent to the teaching; fiducia, personal trust. This view, however, is misleading; for faith, however many aspects it may have, is yet an integral thing, not formed by the synthesis of several acts.

does not arise without the hearing of the message of salvation (mms, Ro 1017) is self-evident and undeputed. On the other hand, the samessus, as the ware persuasion of the power of Christ as Redeemer and of the reality of the God who is above the world, is brought about only in and with the diducts. Only this one thing must remain unobscured, that the right and proper answer of han to the saving revelation that comes to him is the fiducia, and that out of it grows all vertainty and knowledge of God and Divine things '(him).

Some, again, have attempted to draw a positive distinction between faith and trust, regarding faith as the receiving from God, and trust as the yielding of self to God. The essential character istic of faith is indeed receptivity; but it is a mixtake to suppose that the trustful yielding of self to God is anything more or other than the opening of the heart and life to His influence and control through the overmastering revelation of the grace of Christ. In other words, even the trustful de-votion of self to God remains at bottom a receiving from God.

The attempt has been made (cf. esp. E. W. Mayer, Das christliche Gottvertrauen und der Claube as Christus, 1899) to show that while Christ, according to the NT, is the object of faith, only God is the object of the full 'trust' of the Christian. As Jesus, the Christ, revealing in word and deed the Father's holy love, bears the offer of salvation to men, so through their faith in His revelation He brings men to the Father in trust. Trust in God is the consequence of faith in Christ. But can this view be consistently maintained. Faith in Christ—not as Prophet merely, but as the Bearer of salvation—is justified only as we have ground for the assurance that in Him God is dealing with us. So then faith in Christ is trust in the Father, and trust in the Father as revealed in Christ is also trust in the Son, the Bearer of salvation (Jn 14<sup>16</sup>). Certain it is that the writers of the NT saw in Christ more than Teacher and Example. Even as their exalted Lord He continued to be a personal Helper.

So long as the revelation of God's grace was not yet complete in the sending forth of His Son and then of the Spirit of His Son (Gal 4t 6), faith could not rise to its full measure. Before Christ the full conception of faith could not be reached. The word 'trust' occurs frequently in the Psalms and not seldom in certain other OT books. It does however, signify the perfect fellowship of the child of God, but only a reliance upon God's faithfulness. The predominant idea in the trust of the OT was hope. There were heroes of faith before Christ, but their faith could not be perfect, for they had not received the object of their hope (He 11st 0). In Christ the filial disposition is established (cf. c.g. 11st). And so fundamental and all comprehensive was His work as Mediator of the New Covenant that He could be truly called 'the author and perfecter of faith' (12°). Only as men know God in Christ can they know what faith in its full sense is. The life of faith is communion with God in and through Christ, and the nerve of that communion is personal trust. Christian trust is reliance upon God, but not upon 'God out of Christ.' Neither can it be reliance upon Jesus except as the essential revelation of the Father.

except as the essential revelation of the Father.

Not unknown in Church history is a view of the redemptorial work of Christ which would make it consist in appearing an angry God. According to this view Christ and not the Father is the Reconciler, God and not the world is reconciled. In such a case perfect childlike trust is not to be thought of There would be no firm ground for it. If God has once changed His purpose, why should He not do so again? (billy where God is manifest in Christ as the Reconciler of the world (2 Co 519) can there be perfect security for time and eternity. Where Christ is thought of as having wrought a change in the will of God, men will with wavering hope implore Him to interused with God on their behalf, and will perhaps also invoke the sid of many maints. Perfect assurance is not to be reached by this road.

(Jn 14<sup>an</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>an</sup>, 2<sup>a</sup>), but we have the Son only because of the Father's love (Jn 3<sup>a</sup>). Jesus knows the Father, and He teaches us to know Him life is the glorious example of trust in the Father's love. But it is not through the contagious example of the 'unner life' of Jesus that men are led into perfect filial trust. He promised His disciples a perfect joy, which no one should take away (16<sup>20-24</sup>), but this was to come only after He should have been glorified. God's boundless love for sinners must first be manifested in the cross of Christ (Ro 5° 822). Yet even Christ's dying and rising again on our behalf (2 Co 5th) is not the final proof of God's love. God has also sent forth the Spirit of His Son into our hearts (Gal 46, Ro 8148.). The gift of the Spirit means the reality of communion in prayer, and the Spirit's work in us is the pledge of our complete salvation at last (cf. e.g. Ro 8<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>5</sup>). To be rooted and grounded in the love of God, that one may be strengthened to know that love which passeth knowledge (Eph 317"); to know and have believed the love which God hath in us (I Jn 416); and to keep ourselves in the love of God (Jude v.31)—this is the meaning of Christian trust.

Since the sovereign grace of God manifested in Jesus Christ is the only ground of our assurance, we must place no confidence in the flesh (Ph 305). The seed of Abraham or of Israel may not trust in this relation (Mt 30, Jn 8006, Ro 220, Gal 3000). Not may we trust in works of righteousness (e.g., Ro 2006, Etch 60, Th. 30), or a proposal trust of the contraction 3195. Eph 29, Tit 39), or in our good purpose, effort, or zoal (c.q. Ro 916 1025., Ph 39). Even the confession of Christ and the profession of faith will avail nothing without the vital union with Him in the faith that works by love (Mt 7212, Ja 2142, I Co 10<sup>1 11</sup>, Rev 3<sup>1</sup>). Moreover, not even what men call a good conscience can give security (1 Co 424, 1 Jn 188). The wondrous fact of fellowship in the love of God is indeed a token of the life of God And whereinsoever our heart condemn us, we shall obtain assurance in the way of sincere obedience to the Spirit of love. God is greater than our heart-He can pardon and heal And when by His grace our heart is set free from selfcondemnation, our communion with God may be

Upon the immovable foundation of the reconciliation of the world in Christ (2 Co 5146) the individual appropriates to himself the promise by faith. Thereby he experiences a present grace and rejoices in the sure hope of the glory of God (Ro 51-3). Because he has the earnest of the Spirit because God's love has been shed abroad in his heart—he can even glory in tribulations (5<sup>3-6</sup>, cf. 12<sup>13</sup>). Even bearing the cross and being crucified with Christ are his joy and glory (Gal 200 616, Ph. 306.). Out of the richness of the grace of this fellowship he can know that all things work to-gether for his good, that is, for his salvation, and he is persuaded that nothing can separate him from the love of God which is in Christ. There is from the love of God which is in Christ. There is no power that can gainsay the loving will of the eternal God (Ro 8<sup>18-30</sup>). In every condition he proves the sufficiency of Christ's grace (e.g. 2 Co 12°), and by prayer and supplication finds that God's peace, far surpassing all understanding of men, keeps guard over his heart and thoughts in Christ Jesus (Ph 4<sup>6-7</sup>). Through faith he is kept in a hope sure and steadfeat water the final salver. Christ Jesus (1'h 4° ') Through faith he is kept in a hope sure and steadfast unto the final salvation which awaits him (e.g. 1 P 1<sup>36</sup>). But the sureness of the hope does not work carelessness 'Every one that hath this hope set on him purifieth himself even as he is pure' (1 Jn 3°). The true believer is 'careful without care.' Moreover, the grace of our fellowship works zeal in service (1 Co 1510). Only the Christian can enjoy perfect Only as we have the Son do we have the Father | freedom from anxious care in order that he may devote himself fully to the work which God has given him. The past is under the blood and the future is secure in the promises of God (Tholuck). And because he sees in Christ the grand purpose of God in the redemption of the world and the security for the final accomplishment of that purpose, he cannot despair of the world any more than he can despair of himself Because he knows the grace of Christ he can gladly accept his own lot in life, and 'in the patience of hope and the labour of love' serve and wait and watch (Lk 12<sup>20, 28</sup>, 2Co 5<sup>9, 10</sup>).

TRUTH

Christian trust is a state of heart; yet it has seemed better to lay stress upon its ground and essential significance than upon its psychological aspects. Christian joy and peace are effects of a power beyond ourselves. Only God can give them. It is our part to make sure of our union with Christ, and then to see that we receive not the grace of God in vain (2 Co 6). The full realization of the meaning of Christ's promise of peace is not to be had at once. It is the goal of the path of trust, But if there is established the relation of such confidence in God that all our weaknesses, doubts, fears, and ans drive us to our sure Helper, the goal of perfect peace will surely be reached at last (cf. Mt 11<sup>26–26</sup>, He 4<sup>16</sup>).

TRUTH. Apart from the adverbial phrases of a truth (Mk 12<sup>ad</sup>, Lk 4<sup>ad</sup>) and 'truly' (e.g. Mk 14<sup>ad</sup>, 1.k 9<sup>ad</sup> 12<sup>ad</sup>), which are used in their ordinary colloquial sense (cf. Dalman, Words of Jesus, p. 227), the only occurrence of this term in the Synoptic Gospels is in the hypocritical address of the Pharisees and Herodians to Jesus (Mt 22%, Mk 1214, Lk 20°), where these soudsmant inquirers compliment Him on His sincerity as a teacher. Here loyalty to the truth is opposed to the dis-ingenuous spirit that allows itself to be swayed by fear or flattery. The impression made by Jeans on His opponents was one of fearless honesty and candour; He was no casuist or time server, and it was His recognized character of religious frankness and verseity which suggested their trap. For all His sympathies, they knew He would be straightforward. They could count upon His telling dangerous and unpleasant truths, no matter what His word might cost Him. He had the courage without which truthfulness is impossible, and these Jews were cunning enough to trade upon His very Virtues.

In the Fourth Gospel, however, 'truth' is used in a special, pregnant sense, characteristic of the writer and of his age. It is one of the leading categories or themes of the book, and its proportions, as well as its perspective, are entirely different from anything in the Synopties. Occasionally, no doubt, the ordinary sense of the term occurs, as in the phrases about true witness (5<sup>26, 32</sup>, 21<sup>36</sup>), or credible statements (8<sup>26</sup>); here, as elsewhere, the word means no more than veracity, and its adjective represents 'trustworthy' (cf. 105 with 719 816 40 46 and 167). In Pilate's remark, 'Truth' what is truth' '(1820), however, we are on the way to a more definite conception. There is, no doubt, in this scene the implied censure of a false attitude to truth, as Cowper has pointed out.

But what is trith' Twas Pilate's question put To Trith itself that despred him no reply and where re? will not tool impart If it hight To ten that ask it? Freely its His joy. His glory and His nature to impart. But to the probability in nevere, Or negligent inquirer, not a spark."

(Task, bk. in. 1, 270).

Truth, in this passage, however, has the further connotation of speculative or abstract knowledge, and the majority of the references throughout the Gospel are tinged by such associations. They converge on the principle that the spiritual is the real, and that the truth of human life is attainable only in relation to Christ, who is at once the true Life of God and the true means whereby men appropriate that Divine and absolute nature.

appropriate that Divine and absolute nature.

Two small linguistic problems he at the threshold of any attempt to investigate the meaning of 'truth' in the Fourth Gospel. (a) Attempts have been made, notably by Wendt (*** gr. 8.5.* f. 18.5.* p. 311*, and Teaching of Jerus. 1. p. 259* f. to read skehus as equivalent to 'factifulness or 'rectitude,' on the analogy of the LXX rendering (takes as skehus) for the Hebrew original of grave and truth' Certainly, in 114.17, the OT antilbesis is uninstatable. But, apart from the fact that $\frac{1}{2}$ the substituted for itise, the author is evidently using 'truth' here in a deeper and special meaning of his own. The general mage of the term throughout the toopel, whether as applied to God or man, cannot be explained by 'faithfulness' or 'righteous synduct,' any more than to mere 'versect'). Even where the OT form of expression is retained, the content and the substance of the thought are extended and intensified. (b) A original distinction can be drawn between them in the Gospel (note the variant in $18), as if they were equivalent precisely to serus and revus. The latter may be translated 'true,' in the sense of real, as opposed to what is counterfelt (151) or transient and inadequate (19.622.21), but often what is from, in the sense of real, as opposed to what is counterfelt (159) or transient and inadequate (19.622.21), but often what is from, in the sense of real, as opposed to what is thereby substantial, the sole reality anid the shadows of falsebood, just as (fod, who is true (cf. Field, 4N) in 100), as opposed to deceptive and disappointing klols, is also cod, in the sense of heing living and lasting. Herew sands (28) and sandson (29) where the latter, in the sense of real or genume, would have been equally appropriate (cf. 682.18).

Truth, in this specific sense, forms one of the sector of the Fourth Gospel. It is equivalent nuclei of the Fourth Gospel. It is equivalent either to the knowledge of God's being and will, or to the Divine being and will itself; in other words, it represents the higher and heavenly reality of things, transcendent and absolute, and corresponds things, transcendent and absolute, and corresponds generally to light (cf. 1° and 5<sup>22</sup>) in its sphere and functions. Like the light, however, the truth is not an abstract entity, much less an intellectual system, to the author, but this Divine reality as manifested in the incarnate Logos, as revealed in the Son. He is the Truth (14°); He and it are identified (cf. 8<sup>22,26</sup>). All else is transitory and unsubstantial Whatever appears to compete with this truth is either counterfeit or merely relative. Jesus, as the perfect Son of God, is the final and Jesus, as the perfect Son of God, is the final and adequate embodiment of God's saving will; and the common term for that heavenly nature, in relation to man's errors and ignorance, is the truth. But the errors and ignorance against which it has to struggle are moral rather than intellectual. It is truth to be done 13 °, not speculation to be understood. The prerequisite for coming to the light of the Logos is a sound moral disposition, faithfulness to the light of conscience, and genuine sincerity of thought and deed. Such is the point pressed by the author of this Gospel. He was surrounded by a world which included earnest seekers for the truth (cf. 1200,) and so-called 'philosophers or religious theorists, in Judaism and paganism. who refused to accept the Christian estimate of Jesus, and probably preferred Gnostic presenta-tions of communion with God. To meet both of these contemporary currents, he states his conception of Christ as the Truth. With that Christ all truly sincere souls have an affinity, which, if allowed to develop naturally, will bring them into touch with Him. On the other hand, the objections to Christ, often paraded on intellectual grounds, are run back to moral defects, and failure to see the reality of God in Christ is attributed to some unreality of human character. The roots of this unique conception may partly be found in Philo, but ultimately they run back to

Platonism and the later Stoicism (cf. Grill, p. 204f.), while even Egyptian theology had crowned the god Thoth with the attribute aler dληθήs of the Logos (cf. Reitzenstein, Zwei religionsgesch. Fragen, pp. 56, 80 f.). But the distinctive usage of the Fourth Gospel lies in its correlation of this conception with the historic personality of Jesus Christ. The Asiatic-Greek audience for which the book was immediately composed, learnt that He was a king of truth (18<sup>36</sup>), instead of being king of some realm whose Jewish Messianic associations failed to impress Hellenic readers. This was a timely presentation of the Gospel. It was a reading of Christ's personality which could not fail to commend itself to those for whom the more local and national associations of Judaism, or of Jewish Christianity, had lost much, if not all, of their interest and appeal. Hence the emphasis on the two realms of truth and falsehood, or of reality and unreality, which, like the cognate antithesis of light and darkness, helps to body forth the moral dualism of the Gospel. The opposition of men to Christ as the Logos is referred to their connexion with the realm of the devil (8<sup>60</sup>.), whose hereditary policy is hatred of the Divine truth. The author does not speculate on any fall of the devil, nor does he discuss the origin of this cosmic feud; he is content to trace it through history, in felia; he is content to mark in any interest, in the practical experience of mankind. Truth and falsehood, reality and unreality, light and darkness, are set in juxtaposition. His Christ is a ness, are set in juxtaposition. His Christ is a King of Truth. He reigns as Himself holy and true, by the power of the truth which He reveals -truth in the conscience, truth in the heart, and truth in the mind-and over those who, through His grace and spirit, have become fundamentally true; who stand in the eternal, abiding relationship of peace and love and holiness towards God' (Reith, The Gospel of John, ii. p. 138). The contrast between this and the realm of falsehood and unreality is moral, rather than metaphysical, for the writer, though the metaphysical basis is plain.

Hence there is a distinction between the witness borne to the truth by John the Baptist (5<sup>20</sup>) and that borne by Christ (8<sup>20</sup> 18<sup>27</sup>). The former passage (where 'the truth' is meant to cover more than its ordinary sense, although the language of the latter is employed) is in the line of 17t. 19t. But when Jesus is said to bear witness to the truth, or to tell the truth, it is in the sense that He bears witness to Himself (814) as the Truth. His whole Person and work are an adequate revelation of the Father's inner being. To see Him is to see the Father. His witness, therefore, consists in what may be termed His loyalty to Himself, and His devotion to that vocation of being true to God's will for which He became incarnate, and from which no fear of death could deter Him (cf. Lidgett, The Spiritual Principle of the Atomement, p. 24 f.). A further line of witness to the truth of God is afforded by those who accept the revelation of Christ (3<sup>23</sup>). Their adhesion to the truth affords to the world fresh evidence of the truth's power; they, as it were, accredit the transcendent purpose of God by their obedience to it as the moral ideal of their life. Truth (see below) in the Church, which, unlike the so-called Gnostic revelations of fresh knowledge, is ever loyal to the historical personality of Christ, and aims consistently at glorifying, instead of obscuring or diminishing, the vital significance of

His life for the human soul.

This note is struck loudly and clearly at the very outset, in the Prologue: 'And the Logos became flesh and dwelt among us. And we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the VOL. II.—49

Father, full of grace and truth. . . . For of his fulness we have all received, even grace upon grace. For the law was given through Moses: grace and truth came through Jesus Christ' (Jn 1<sup>14</sup> 16. 17). Here, just as the conception of the Truth is subordinated to that of the Way in 14<sup>5</sup>, the aspect of grace controls that of truth. Religion, in this definition is not the arduous assiration of man's definition, is not the arduous aspiration of man's God, but the gracious revelation of God to men through the Person of Jesus Christ; the initiative is on God's side; and the Divine nature, in its absolute reality, is mediated for the soul by Christ. absolute reality, is mediated for the soul by Christ alone, not by any number of theosophic zeons. All that either the OT economy or contemporary Gnosticism could offer the soul was a partial disclosure of God's inner being. Time-honoured and plausible as rival methods might be, they were at best imperfect. The full revelation was in Christ as the Logos or Son of God par excellence, the Truth of God, and therefore of man, amid shadows and appearances. He is the revealer or rather the and appearances. He is the revealer, or rather the revelation Himself. His personality is the sum and substance of that Divine easence which He alone can communicate in all its fulness to believing men, and through which men realize themselves fully. He is the true way to life. The author emphasizes this central and primary conception on two lines. Not only does he change the 'mercy' of the Gr. OT into 'grace,'—a change which is all the more significant that this great Pauline term never recurs in the Gospel,—but the companion idea of truth (cf. Ex 346) is expanded from faithfulness or veracity to what a modern might describe as the absolute character of the Divine Being, an inner, heavenly reality, or rather the Reality, which Christ alone (1<sup>18</sup>) could disclose. The 'truth' of God is thus neither information to be gained, nor dogmas to be supernaturally revealed, but is at once personal and full of initiative. It is God Himself manifesting His essential life to the faith and need of man. As Maurice once put it, 'Truth must be a person seeking us, if we are to seek

While this mission and ministry of the truth have reached their climax in the brief earthly life of Jesus, the latter phase was only its final, not its first manifestation. Like the Light, the Truth has been in the world prior to its absolute revelation and embodiment in Christ the Logos (3<sup>20, 21</sup>). In all ages, and from all quarters (cf. 18<sup>27</sup>), Christ draws to Himself those who practise the truth. In the OT and elsewhere (Jos 2<sup>14</sup> [LXX], Ps-Sol 17<sup>17</sup> with Aeos, cf. Ps 83<sup>13</sup>) this phrase means simply to deal truly or to set sincerely according to the to deal truly or to act sincerely, according to the context. The author of this Gospel, however, follows his usual method of putting into such phrases a deeper and specific content, so that here it denotes rather the active exercise and practical it denotes rather the active exercise and practical manifestation by good people of what corresponds to God's real character. To practise the truth is a synonym for doing works in God (3<sup>21</sup>). This is independent of nationality. It is also evidently intended to cover the pre-Christian era; or rather, according to this Gospel, the history of humanity, prior to the coming of Christ, was not wholly out of touch with the true Spirit and Life of God (1<sup>25</sup>). The present passage, taken along with a remark like that of 18<sup>37</sup> ('every one that is of the truth heareth my voice'), suggests a view of paganism similar to that of Ro 2<sup>124</sup>. Furthermore, it implies that men grasp this 'truth' of God by the exercise of their entire moral nature. The reality of God, as Spirit and as Personal Life, cannot be known except by real men, by those whose character is real to the core. The conditions of that personal knowledge are singleness of mind, purity of conscience, and openness of heart. It is the exercise of these that brings a man into permanent touch with the reality of the Divine nature as manifested in Christ. The locus classicus for this profound conception is 7<sup>17</sup>; although the term 'truth' does not occur there, the identification of disinterestedness and candour with the genuine spirit of truth (cf. 7<sup>18</sup>) shows that the idea was in the writer's mind.

This inwardness, with its corollary of freedom from national or local cults, is brought out with especial clearness in the well-known definition of Christian worship (4<sup>23, 24</sup>), where truth is associated with spirit. In contrast to external and ritual worship, the genuine worshipper must approach God inwardly; it is like to like, as in 3<sup>21</sup>. The spiritual is the inward, the real. As God's nature is such, His worshippers must correspond to Him; and if worship is offered in the spirit, it is thereby genuine. A similar antithesis to the symbolic and unsubstantial worship of the OT underlies 1717-19 where truth, in a certain abstract sense, denotes the eternal reality of the Divine nature as revealed to men, the ideal or truth of life realized in Christ, and, through Him, in His people. By His consecration or devotion of Himself to the fulfilment of this purpose of revelation, Christ makes it possible for His disciples to be consecrated to God's service—a consecration which, as the double meaning of the term allows, implies personal purification from sin. Negatively, the vocation is equivalent to a deliverance from the stains and illusions of the transient world, which is superior to the OT ritual. Positively, it denotes an adherence to the cause of God. His name and His truth are the same. They represent the reality of the Divine revelation in Christ, with the twofold antithesis, running through the entire Gospel, between this final revelation and the inadequate OT religion on the one hand, and contemporary philosophic or theosophic speculations about truth on the other.

A further application of this freedom, inherent in the absolute and inward character of the Christian revelation, occurs in the debate (cf. Peyton, Memorabilia of Jesus, p. 446 f.) between Jesus and the Jews in 8<sup>314</sup>.—a passage which reproduces the great Pauline ideas of Gal 3<sup>7</sup>–5<sup>13</sup>, although redemption as usual is included under the aspect of revelation, rather than vice versa. The effects of truth, when received by more real-parallel supported to the specific of truth, when received by more real-parallel supported to the specific of the specific of truth, when received by more real-parallel supported to the specific of the sp when received by men, are here described summarily as freedom (8321.). The argument is this. As the Father seeks true worshippers, whose note is spirituality, so the Son seeks true disciples, whose characteristic is loyal adherence to His teaching, i.e. to Himself (cf. 832.38) as the revelation of the Father. Adherence or obedience of this kind yields a knowledge of God's real nature; it initirates men into the true purpose and mind of the Father, and invests them with the Divine nature itself (17<sup>3</sup>). Their knowledge, that is to say, is not a process of abstract learning. There is no intellectualism about it. It is not a mastery of theosophic principles or subtle theories, but participasophic principles of state theories, but participa-tion in a personal Life. And contact with this brings a verve and independence into life, a sim-plicity and a reality, a freedom from bondage and legalism, which can be attained only by a nature whose capacities are set free to realize themselves In another aspect, freedom may be considered as deliverance from sin; although such a reference is not excluded even in 8<sup>82</sup>, it is definitely suggested in 17<sup>19</sup>, where participation in the Divine life is made to involve personal purification, through the death of Christ. 'What men needed was to be sanctified, that is, to be consecrated to God. was not in their power—surely no reason can be conceived for this, but that which lies in their sin—to consecrate themselves, and what they were not able to do for themselves Christ did for them in His own person. He consecrated Himself to God in His death' (Denney, The Death of Christ, p. 269).

A third aspect of this inward and absolute knowledge of God in Christ is presented in the conception of the Spirit or Paraclete throughout the closing chapters (14-17). Considered under the category of a liberating power, these references to the func-tion of the Spirit of Truth (which, it is curious to recollect, were applied to Mohammed by Mohammedan divines) may be defined as a presentation of the liberating effect of the truth, as opposed to traditional and antiquarian views of Jesus which, even within the Church, might restrict the full appreciation of His Person. The author had to meet a twofold danger, and he chose to state his new conception of Christ and Christianity in the form of a Gospel, not of a treatise or an Epistle. One reason for this, as he suggests in the sayings reproduced in 15<sup>26</sup> and 16<sup>13</sup>, is his heartfelt conviction that the Person of Christ is the sum and substance of the Divine revelation, and that no fresh statements or progressive views, such as those promulgated by Cerinthus and other Gnostics, are authoritative unless they represent elements already present by implication in the words and works of the incarnate Logos. The deeper interpretation of Christ, with which he came forward to meet the requirement of a later age, is none other than a fresh discovery of latent truths in Christ. The influence of the Spirit on the consciousness of the Church is not directed to the manufacture of independent oracles or to the task of striking out original additions to the revelation of Christ, which would render the latter, in any sense, superfluous or in-The test of all such new interpretations is their loyalty to the historic manifestation of the Logos. The Spirit of Truth, bestowed by Christ upon His Church (14<sup>16t</sup>.), recalls to the mind of all true disciples the bearing and meaning of Christ's own teachings; 'he shall bear witness of me . . . he shall guide you into all the truth (for a different reading in Jerome, etc., cf. Nestle's Einfuhrung?, p. 98), for he shall not speak from himself . . . he shall glorify me, for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you' (cf. Bruce, The Training of the Twelve, pp. 376 f., 418 f.). This great definition of the right and limitations of true freedom of movement within the Christian consciousness, safeguards it alike against the abuses of Gnostic speculation and the disinclination to advance beyond the Jewish-Christian, or rigidly Messianic, interpretation of Christ's Person which had been promulgated by the first generation of the disciples. To know Christ after the flesh was far from exhausting the significance of His Person. His Spirit, i.e. His living presence in the Christian Church and consciousness, had still more to unfold of truth and grace. Hence one privilege of being in contact with this 'Truth,' as embodied in Christ, is that disciples, no longer in touch with the earthly Jesus, are fitted to adapt to varying conditions, to see it in ever fresh bearings, and to apply it with inexhaustible power, while at the same time they preserve its essential meaning. Their training in it, so far from involving the same time they preserve its essential meaning. ing any disloyalty to it, is a part of their fidelity to its principles.

'They who follow the Spirit's guidance will not receive an illumination enabling them to dispense with truth, but the enablement to lay hold of truth. . . . On the one hand, the fruth given in Christ will need from age to age His expounding to unlock its stores; and, on the other hand, the faith in Him and His office in the present shall never loosen men from the Gospel given once for all, or draw them away from the eternal Father, by enabling any voice born only of the present to seem wholly Divine. Standing fast in the unchanging Truth, and an endless progress in taking knowledge of it shall be indissolubly united '(Hort, The Way, the Truth, and the Life, p. 58 f.).

Thus, while the author carefully and stringently safeguards the future revelations of religious truth

by limiting them to the sphere of the historical Logos, he contemplates fresh advances in the apprehension of Christ (16<sup>18</sup>), just as he does in the practical extension of the Church (17<sup>29</sup>). Revelations in the future, and of the future, fall within the scope of the Spirit of Truth. The latter is not fettered by the past. This prophetic function of the Spirit may seem rather one-sided (so Beyschlag, NT Theol. i. 282) as compared with its ethical presentation in Paul. But it is in line with the Synoptic tradition, where the Spirit is primarily, if not entirely, a spirit of witness; while the other, more ethical aspect, is at least suggested in the context (cf. 14<sup>16.17</sup>). The truth or reality of the Divine life, at any rate, includes the future (cf. Ps 25<sup>5</sup> [LXX]); as indeed it must, if God's purpose is a developing plan throughout history and experience, and if this truth or reality is personal. For as a personality is ex hypothesi full of resources and surprises, the richer is its life. Its spirit must be a perennial self-expression, conditioned only by the receptive powers of men. Consequently the aim of the Fourth Gospel, in these allusions to the progressive witness of the Spirit of Truth, in the future and of the future, is to prevent loyalty to the historic essence of Christianity from degenerating into stagnant adherence to an institution or a creed. What Jesus said, as Cyprian used to insist, was: 'I am the Truth,' not, 'I am Tradition.' Christ is God's last Word to the world. But, as the writer strikingly implies in the phrase, 'The Spirit shall guide you into all the truth,' the full interpretation of that Word was not attained by the primitive generation of the disciples. They had no monopoly of it. 'Most friends of truth,' said Vinet, 'love it as Frederick the Great loved music. It used to be said of him that, strictly speaking, he was not fond of music but of the flute, and not indeed fond of the flute but of his flute.' It is to prevent any religious aberration of this kind that such words of t

TURNING.—1. The Gospel terms.—In EV of the Gospels the vbs. 'turn,' 'convert' represent no fewer than 8 different Gr. words. The ordinary terms, and the ones we have almost exclusively to do with in the following article, are στρέφω and έπιστρέφω (whence ἐπιστροφή, 'conversion,' in Ac 15³). In addition to these we find (each, however, used only once in the Gospels) ἀποστρέφω (Mt 5²), ὑποστρέφω (Lk 2²), ἀναχωρέω (Mt 2²), ἀνακάμπτω (Lk 10³), ἀποβαίνω (21³), γίνομαι (Jn 16²),—all associated with the idea of turning, and rendered by 'turn' either in AV or RV.

(1) Literal turning.—Both στρέφω and ἐπιστρέφω are used in this sense. Once στρέφω occurs transitively, where Jesus bids His disciples, when smitten on the right cheek, turn the other to the smiter (Mt 5.00). Both vbs. frequently occur in the passive form, but with a reflexive or middle meaning, to denote the turning of oneself round. Usually it is Jesus Himself who thus turns round (στραφείς, έπιστραφείs), to look for someone (e.g. Mk 5<sup>30</sup>, Lk 22<sup>61</sup>), or to address some pointed word to those who follow (e.g. Mt 16<sup>22</sup>, Lk 9<sup>25</sup>).

(2) Figurative or spiritual turning.—In this sense both στρέφω and ἐπιστρέφω are employed, but the former only once (Mt 18³). The noun ἐπιστροφή, corresponding to ἐπιστρέφω in its spiritual sense, does not occur in the Gospels, and is found only in Ac 15². Both in the Gospels and elsewhere in the NT the AV frequently renders these vbs., when they denote a spiritual turning, by 'convert,' and in Ac 15³ it renders ἐπιστροφή by 'convert,' and in Ac 15³ it renders ἐπιστροφή by 'conversion.' RV retains 'conversion' in the last-mentioned passage, and 'convert' in Ja 5¹¹². ²²² (where the vb. is active and transitive—'convert a sinner'); but otherwise it has substituted 'turn' for 'convert'—a wise course, in view of the fact that in modern religious speech 'conversion' has come to be used in a conventional sense that does not always correspond to the meaning of the original. In another important respect the RV has corrected a wrong impression produced by the AV renderings. The latter, through the influence of the Vulg. (convertor), not only uses the vb. 'convert,' but renders the reflexive στρέφεσθαι, ἐπιστρέφεσθαι as if they were genuine passives, and instead of 'turn' has 'be converted.' A still more glaring mistranslation appears in the quotation from Is 6¹¹⁰ [LXX] given in Mt 13¹²₅, Jn 12⁴⁰, Ac 28π² (cf. Mk 4¹²). In Is 6¹⁰ AV, correctly enough, has 'lest they convert'— 'convert' in the time of King James being used intransitively. But in the NT passages, though the Gr. vb., except in Jn 12⁴⁰, is in the active form, just as in the LXX, the 'convert' of Isaiah is changed into 'be converted.' Both in the lastmentioned passages and in those cases in which, in accordance with the ordinary usage, the vbs. though passive in form are certainly reflexive in meaning, RV has changed the 'be converted' of AV into 'turn' (see Mt 13¹¹ 18³, Mk 4¹², Lk 22²², Jn 12⁴⁰, Ac 3¹⁰ 28π²). It is with this spiritual turning or 'conversion' that we shall be occupied in the remainder of the article.

2. The NT facts.—(1) So far as the term 'turn' or 'convert' is concerned, the Gospels can hardly be said to afford sufficient data for a doctrine of conversion in the modern sense of the word. In Mt 13<sup>15</sup>, Mk 4<sup>12</sup>, Jn 12<sup>10</sup> an OT prophecy (Is 6<sup>10</sup>) is referred to; but both in its original use and its NT application it is a national rather than an individual turning that is meant. Again, the notable passage, Mt 18<sup>3</sup> 'Except ye turn, and become as little children,' etc., though often taken as a fundamental utterance of our Lord on the subject of conversion, can hardly be used for this purpose when read in the light of the context. For it was addressed directly to the Twelve at a time long subsequent to their call to the Apostolate; and, with the exception of Judas, who will venture to say that the Apostles at this period were 'unconverted' men? Moreover, the turning which Jesus demanded of them was not that absolute turning from sin in order to follow Himself which the word 'conversion' is used to denote, but a turning from those foolish, unworthy ambitions which had just prompted the question, 'Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven?'(v.¹), and a recognition of the truth that in God's Kingdom humility is the real badge of greatness. Similarly, when our Lord says to Peter, 'When once thou hast turned again (AV 'When thou art converted'), stablish thy brethren' (Lk 22<sup>32</sup>), it seems evident that the Apostle did not lack conversion in the technical meaning of the word, but that he was being summoned beforehand to a fresh and more devoted return to his Master's service after his fall.

When we pass to Acts, however, we do find ἐπιστρέφω and ἐπιστροφή in a sense that corresponds to the familiar use of the term 'conversion.' St. Peter, preaching to the multitude in Solomon's Porch, says, 'Repent ye therefore, and turn again, that your sins may be blotted out' (Ac 3<sup>19</sup>), the turning he demands is unquestionably the kind of turning that conversion implies. When it is said of the inhabitants of Lydda that they 'turned to When it is said the Lord' (926), it is their conversion that is referred to. So likewise at Antioch, when 'a great number that believed turned unto the Lord' (1121); and when Paul and Barnabas preached to the people of Lystra that they should 'turn from these vain things unto the living God' (14<sup>18</sup>); and again when the same Apostles passed through Phoenicia and Samaria 'declaring the conversion of the Gentiles,' and causing great joy unto all the brethren (15<sup>3</sup>; see, further, v. 19 26<sup>18</sup> 20).

In the Epistles the use of the figure of turning to denote the great spiritual change that constitutes a man a Christian is infrequent; but we have it in 2 Co 316, and notably in 1 Th 19 'How ye turned unto God from idols, to serve a living and true God.' And this use of the word 'turn,' we must remember, was not only a natural figure to denote a great spiritual transformation, but one denote a great spiritual transformation, but one that was especially familiar to every pious Jew. The prophetic writings are full of it. And nowhere, whether in the OT or the NT, is there a finer expression of the idea than in the words of Deutero-Isaiah: 'Let the wicked forsake his way, and the warrichteous man his thoughts, and let and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon' (Is 55"; cf. 610, Ps 5113, Jer 314, Ezk 3311, Hos 126, JI 2124, Zec 134.).

(2) But we are not confined to the terms for 'turning' in the NT, in seeking there for the fact of conversion. The reality itself is constantly in evidence. In the ministry of our Lord Himself we have manifest access of conversion in the sinful have manifest cases of conversion in the sinful woman in the house of Simon the Pharisee (Lk ram.), in Zacchæus the publican of Jerichs (19st.), in the penitent robber on the cross (23<sup>42, 43</sup>). The parable of the Prodigal Son (15<sup>11s.</sup>), who 'came to himself' and then returned to his father, is a parable of conversion. And what are those great appeals that Jesus constantly makes—for a taking up of the cross in order to follow Him (Mt 16<sup>24</sup> ||), for a willingness to lose one's life in order to find it (10<sup>36</sup> 18<sup>26</sup> 9), for a 'hating' of one's dearest friends in order to be His disciple (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>)—but a demand for conversion, even though the figure of turning is not employed?

In the story of the Apostolic Church, again, we have constant illustrations of the great spiritual change—the 3000 souls brought into the Church on the day of Pentecost (Ac 241), and those who thereafter were added to them day by day (v. <sup>4</sup>); the results that everywhere followed the preaching the results that everywhere followed the preaching of the word, whether by the lips of evangelists (8<sup>8</sup>. 6.12 11<sup>21.23</sup>) or Apostles (9<sup>38</sup> 10<sup>44</sup> 14<sup>1</sup> etc.); the striking individual cases of the Ethiopian eunuch (8<sup>37</sup>), Cornelius (10<sup>447</sup>, 11<sup>18</sup>), Lydia of Thyatira (16<sup>144</sup>), and the jailer of Philippi (v. <sup>3057</sup>). Above all, we have the case of St. Paul himself—the most typical and remarkable example the world has 26124.)

(3) Once more, the fact of conversion is brought before us in the teaching of the Epistles, and above all in the Pauline Epistles, by the employment of other figures than that of turning. For it is evidently conversion that is described by the putting off of the old man and the putting on of the new (Col 3°), by the transition from a world of darkness to a kingdom of light (Ro 1312, Eph 5°, Col 118, 1 Jn 1728), by the ideas of a crucifixion of the old self (Ro 66), an awaking out of sleep (Eph 514), and even a rising from the dead with a view to walking in newness of life (ib., Ro 6). This last figure of a rising from the dead reminds us how near conversion as a forthputting of the human will approaches to regeneration as an act of the Divine Spirit, and so brings us to consider the subject in its larger doctrinal relations.

3. The Christian doctrine.—Properly speaking conversion as we use the word is a modern and popular rather than a Scriptural or theological term; but, while its inexactness leads sometimes to its being misapplied, it is nevertheless a convenient word to denote the conscious side of that great change by which a man becomes a Christian. In dwelling further on it we may think (1) of its essential nature; (2) of its particular contents; and (3) of its types or modes.

(1) The essential nature of conversion.—There is a very frequent misconception, according to which conversion is thought of as a passive experience rather than an active energizing of the human will. We have often heard it said, for example, that someone 'has got converted.' Most, if not all, of the blame for this incorrect use of the word must be laid at the door of the AV, with its 'be con-verted' instead of 'turn.' The Greek lends no support to the idea of a passive conversion. If we except Ja 5<sup>19, 20</sup> (where the reference is to the action, not of the Divine power, but of the human preacher or teacher who mediates the message of salvation), there is not a single case in the NT where the word for turning or conversion is so employed as to suggest that something is wrought upon a man from without. Always it is an act of the man himself that is so described; the turning is a self-turning, a human and moral, not a supernatural and metaphysical change.

This, of course, is not to deny that there are other figures in the NT which represent the process. of becoming a Christian as something that is carried through by the operation of a Divine power. The new birth (Jn 3<sup>36</sup>), the new creation (2 Co 5<sup>17</sup>, Gal 6<sup>15</sup>), the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost (Tit 3<sup>5</sup>), all point to another side of the matter. But what we have to notice here is that, as distinguished from regeneration, conversion at all events is always represented as a work and a duty the full responsibility for which is laid upon man.

When we come to consider the precise relations between conversion and regeneration, we pass into a difficult region where questions are raised which, as Professor Laidlaw has said, it has been the habit of theologians to avoid. 'Reformed theology presents no reasoned connexion between regeneration in the stricter sense and conversion with its fruits (Bib. Doct. of Man, 266). And for lack of a reasoned and definite theory, or even of a careful study of the NT teaching, the figure of regeneration has very commonly been overworked, while the moral side of the change involved in becoming a Christian has been neglected. But, while it is Scriptural to say that when a man becomes a Christian a mysterious Divine work has been effected within him, it is equally Scriptural to say (and Scripture says it much oftener) that we become Christians by our own free choice, and that the power of deciding whether we are to be Christ's disciples or not rests with ourselves. Thus we are brought face to face with the larger problem of the relation between human freedom and the Divine will, and can only say here that in the NT regeneration and conversion come before us as one and the same process, looked at from the Divine and the human side respectively, but looked at as essentially a moral rather than a metaphysical change. Men are born of the Spirit, but they must turn if they are to enter into the Kingdom of God. 'This my son was dead, and is alive again,' exclaimed the father of the Prodigal, for he recognized a miracle of Divine grace in his son's return. But that heavenly mystery had its human counterpart, that miracle of grace its moral coefficient; for the Prodigal had turned away from the swine-trough, 'and he arose and came to his father.' See, further, art. RE-

(2) The particular elements of conversion.—When we analyze conversion, two elements show them-selves; for two moments are involved in every act of turning: there is a turning from and a turning to. Christian conversion is a turning from self, the world, and sin; and a turning to God in Christ. But these are just the two moral acts which in the NT are commonly designated by the names 'repent-ance' and 'faith.' And so it seems proper to say ance' and 'faith.' And so it seems proper to say that repentance and faith are the elements that go to make up conversion. And this is confirmed when we find that in the record of the Apostolic preaching conversion or turning is associated with repentance on the one hand and faith on the other. Repent on the one hand and faith on the other. 'Repent ye therefore, and turn again' is the point to which ye therefore, and turn again' is the point to which St. Peter brings his sermon in Solomon's Porch (Ac 3<sup>19</sup>); and St. Paul's claim, as he stands before King Agrippa, is that he has declared alike to Jew and Gentile 'that they should repent and turn to God' (28<sup>20</sup>). On the other hand, we read of the Greeks of Antioch that 'a great number that believed turned unto the Lord' (11<sup>21</sup>). Corresponding again with this separate presentation of the two sides of conversion, is the fact that St. Paul combines the two when he says to the elders of the Ephesian Church, as he sums up his ministry of the Ephesian Church, as he sums up his ministry among them, that both to Jews and Greeks his testimony has been this: 'repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ '(Ac 2021). Much has been written on the question whether in conversion repentance comes before faith, or faith before repentance. From the point of view of theory it is a somewhat barren discussion; and when we come to practice, the fact appears to be that in the conscious experience of the soul faith rises into more immediate prominence in some cases and repentance in others. But what is of importance is to note that in conversion both are inextricably joined together in the unity of a complex but single moral act.

(3) The modes or types of conversion.—(a) Two strongly contrasted types meet us in the NT and in the whole history of Christian experience. The one is marked by deep contrition for sin—contrition that amounts in some cases to a positive agony of mental distress. From the other the element of pain and contrition is almost wholly absent; it consists in a joyful and unclouded acceptance of the love of God as revealed in the face of Jesus Christ. St. Paul and the jailer of Philippi are representa-tives of the violent and painful type of conversion -reproduced in the later history of the Church in the experience of such men as Augustine and Bunyan. Cornelius, the Ethiopian eunuch, and Lydia 'the seller of purple,' may stand, perhaps, for the gentler and simply trustful type—forerunners of multitudes like them in every subsequent age. Theologically the difference between these two types might be accounted for by saying that as repentance and faith are the two elements that go to make up conversion, in the one case repentance is more prominent, and in the other faith. For while it is true that repentance is primarily a change of mind, and is not to be confounded with the mere feeling of sorrow on account of sin, yet repentance is at all events that side of conversion which represents the soul's backward and down-ward look, just as faith is the aspect of it in which the soul looks forward and upward. And so con-have usually come into such lives. For the un-trition for the sorrowful past, even while it must be distinguished from true repentance, is yet in certain cases its very natural accompaniment. The full explanation, however, of the differences between these two types of conversion must be sought from psychology rather than theology, in the field of experience and not in that of doctrinal They are due for the most part to diversities in natural temperament, in personal history, in religious education, and especially in the prevailing atmosphere of religious thought and belief. Professor Henry Drummond, remarking on the fact that in his wide experience as an evangelist he had never met with conversions of the agonizing type so common in an earlier generation, once raised the question whether the Holy Spirit may not in these days have changed His modus operand. The question is startling; but considered in the light of Jn 16<sup>13</sup> it may have the kernel of truth in it. For the Holy Spirit has led the Church of our time into new and larger views regarding the revelation of God in Christ; and the comparative infrequency of a once familiar type of conversion is probably due to the fact that, without sur-rendering their belief in the reality and heinousness of sin, both the Christian evangelist and his hearers have gained a better understanding of all that is involved in the Fatherhood of God and the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

(b) Two other well-known and strongly contrasted types are those of sudden and gradual or, as it is sometimes called, nurtural conversion. Of the former the NT affords numerous examples; indeed, nearly all the NT conversions are evidently sudden in their mode. It does not follow, however, that we should take this to be the ordinary, much less the only legitimate type. In NT times it lay in the nature of the case that conversion should be sudden. The gospel made its appeal at first to those who had grown up in a world ruled by principles the very opposite of those of the Divine Kingdom, and the transition from either Judaism or paganism to Christianity was bound to be of the nature of an absolute and sudden break. And such conversions, of course, are common still, in Christian lands as well as in the mission field,—in the case of those who find themselves standing face to face at last with the Christ of whom they have never heard before, or of whom they have never rightly thought, or whose grace, though long familiar enough, they have hitherto deliberately resisted. Then constantly there takes place, as Henry Drummond said, 'an experience which words are not allowed to utter-a something like the sudden snapping of a chain, the waking from a dream' (Nat. Law in the Spir. World, 94).

It is different in the case of those who from infancy have been brought up under the nurturing care of the Christian Church and a Christian home, and who have almost unconsciously been responding to this nurtural treatment. Timothy suggests to us an example in NT times of gradual or nurtural conversion (Ac 16<sup>1</sup>, 1 Ti 1<sup>3</sup>); though it was through St. Paul's teaching, no doubt, that his early training blossomed into the flower of a rich personal faith (1 Co 4<sup>17</sup>). In later times nurtural conversions become common; and under ideal conditions of Christian education they may be regarded as the normal type. When one has been born in a normal type. When one has been born in a Christian home, dedicated to Christ in infancy, surrounded continually by a Christian atmosphere, and so has learned 'from a child' to know and love and follow Jesus, a sudden and startling conversion is not to be looked for. Christians with such a history can seldom tell the day and hour of their conversion. And yet the name of 'conversion' is not to be withheld from certain experiences that conscious Christianity of childhood needs to be transformed into the conscious Christianity of developed character. There may be no day and hour that can be named, but there is generally a pretty well-defined period when the first instinctive love and faith and obedience pass into the deliberate attitude of the surrendered will.

Modern students of the psychology of religious experience have proved to how large an extent what we call 'conversion' is associated with those physiological and psychological changes that belong to the transition from childhood to dawning man-hood or womanhood. This transition is not a sudden process, not a thing of a day or an hour. It covers a considerable period, but in that period a momentous work is going on. And in those days there comes to every young soul that has been well nurtured a new feeling of the beauty and mystery of life, and a fresh sense also of the possibilities that life offers of good as well as of evil. The old Greek stories about the parting of the ways and the choice of youth are not only perennially true, but have a special Christian application. Even those who have learned from their earliest childand Lord do not escape the need for a critical decision. When the time comes for taking up the free development of character, Jesus Christ stands at the parting of the ways; and though He knows of very many that they have been following Him hitherto, He asks whether they are going to forsake Him now or follow Him still. When a young heart replies, like Simon Peter of old (Jn 6<sup>67L</sup>), 'Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal whom shail we go; thou hast the words of eternal life, that heart has turned consciously and deliberately to Christ. Of such conversions there are multitudes; for in order to conversion a soul does not need to be violently plucked up by the roots and transplanted to another soil. It is enough if, knowing what it does, it turns joyfully to Christ, as the flower turns to follow the pathway of the

(c) The question is sometimes raised whether it is possible for a man to be converted more than once; and point is given to the inquiry by the fact that in the night in which He was betrayed the Lord said to Peter, 'When once thou has turned again (AV 'when thou art converted'), stablish thy brethren' (Lk 22<sup>32</sup>). It is impossible, however, to suppose that that process of conversion which is the full equivalent on the human side for the Divine act of regeneration is an experience that can be repeated. And in the case of St. Peter, it is evident from the Gospels that the definite yielding of his will to Christ took place at the beginning of the Lord's ministry, and not after the ministry was ended. But these words of Jesus to His Apostle suggest that while conversion in the express and primary sense can be experienced only once, there are secondary conversions, of one kind or another, that may fall within the compass of a true Christian life. One such is when a Christian man, as in Peter's case, has fallen into grievous sin, but repents and turns to Christ again, not only 'with grief and hatred of his sin,' but with a fuller purpose of new obedience than he ever cherished before. This is that repentance of a Christian before. This is that repentance of a Christian man which St. Paul describes in 2 Co 7<sup>11</sup>—a repentance which may work in him such indignation against himself, such vehement desire to make amends for his backsliding, and as it were to be 'avenged' upon it, that he may become in many respects a stronger Christian than he was before, and thus better able to stablish and strengthen his brethren. Another type of secondary conversion is when a man, without the quickening spur of repentance for some great backsliding, comes to a fuller realization of Christ's claim upon him for the costliest and best he has to give, and so makes a fresh and higher departure in the Christian life, a departure that is deliberate and definite, and thus may properly be described as a turning. In ways like these there may be several conversions or spiritual turning-points in a Christian's history zigzags, so to speak, on the steep ascending path upon which he made his definite entrance when he first turned to Christ, with full consciousness, as the Lord and Master of his life.

the Lord and Master of his life.

TYRE (for many common features, see SIDON). The most noted district and city of Phoenicia, the city being 40 miles N.W. of Capernaum in Galilee. Its name is simply the 'Rock,' from two rocks in the sea—a larger and a smaller—a mile distant from the shore, lying parallel therewith, about 3000 feet in length, and containing some 150 acres. This 'Rock,' as a breakwater, early invited mariners, and ultimately furnished the elements of two harbours,—the Sidonian, north; and to the south the Egyptian, now long filled with sand. It served also as a fortress, as well as a treasure-house for the merchandise that there was stored for transshipment between East and West. Old Tyre was the residential portion, extending at times for 5 miles along the shore.

As early as the monuments of Egypt and the Amarna tablets, Tyre is mentioned with Sidon as a locality of note. Its daring sailors had mastered the art of sailing the open sea by the stars, thus outdoing rivals who as yet had to steer by sight of land, and anchor at night. In the height of their power Tyrian merchantmen frequented every Mediterranean port, sailing the Atlantic to the tin mines of Britain, and even perhaps circumnavigating Africa.

In the middle of the 7th cent. B.C. Ashurbanipal laid siege to Tyre and practically destroyed the land city. Alexander the Great besieged Tyre for seven months, at the end of which he completely subdued it. Under the Romans it was in a state of decay, morally as well as otherwise. To-day it clings to the rock, a community of some 4000, a stagnant Arab village of fisher-folk.

As the conflict between the authorities and Jesus waxed to the murder-point, the masses of the people flocked to Him all the more. St. Mark (38) paints the mixed throng on the banks of Gennesaret as coming from all points of the compass, including a curious Gentile multitude from 'about Tyre and Sidon.' St. Luke's specification (6<sup>17</sup>) is not so extensive, but, true to his breadth of interest, portrays 'a great multitude of the people from . . . the seacoast of Tyre and Sidon,' while St. Matthew (4"2) is oblivious to such. Compared with the disbelief of Jesus' hearers and kin in Galilee, Tyre should stand immeasurably above those of greater light and opportunities, but of less susceptibility and response to the same (Mt 11<sup>216</sup>). Guilt and condemnation are relative. When Jesus had had to break with the carnally-minded populace that desired only an insurrectionary leader and temporal king, He retired for intensive instruction of the Twelve to the parts of Tyre (1521 ||); and there it | WOMAN.

UNBELIEF.—The withholding of belief, incredulity. In respect to Divine things the term implies absence of faith, credence refused to religious tenets. Infidelity, in its sense of want of faith or belief, is a synonym; not, however, scepticism, for the latter word is more properly used of the indecision of the reflective mind. Nor is disbelief an exact equivalent : unbelief suggests rather the failure to admit; disbelief implies deliberate and positive rejection. The unbeliever is open to conviction; the one who disbelieves is convinced (at all events for the time being) of the inadequacy of proofs submitted, of the improbability or impossi-bility of that which is proposed for acceptance. In the one case the explanation may point to want of knowledge; in the other the exercise of the reasoning faculty presupposes acquaintance, if imperfect, with the questions at issue.

Illustrations in the Gospels.—The term rendered 'unbelief' is the noun drioria (occurring 5 times: Mt 1368 1720, Mk 66 924 1614), with a range of meaning between distrust and disbelief. There is the use of the verb πιστεύω with the objective (οὐ) or subjective ( $\mu\eta$ ) negative; occasionally the intensitive ( $\omega \mu\eta$ ) is met with: here again varying shades of significance are observable. Four times (Mk 16<sup>11, 16</sup>, Lk 24<sup>11, 41</sup>) the verb dπιστέω occurs; and in each case the 'disbelieve' of RV suggests that it is used absolutely. It may be remarked generally that the questions at issue differ, and that there are differences in regard to mental attitude.

(a) In the Synoptics.—Jesus is on a visit to 'his own country.' If Lk 416 refers to a previous visit (which is unlikely), He will seek once more to win His fellow-townsmen when (Mt 13<sup>83, 54</sup>, Mk 6<sup>1, 2</sup>) He takes His stand in the synagogue at Nazareth. They are, indeed, astonished at His wisdom: the reports of mighty works done by Him have filled them with amazement; but they are little disposed to give a patient and sympathetic hearing to one of whom they themselves have known so much, and withal nothing that has augured greatness. His claims scandalize them. They reject His teaching and Himself. 'And he marvelled,' διὰ την ἀπιστίαν airar (Mk 6°); it became evident that 'a Divine "cannot" answers to a Divine "must" (Westcott). If the unbelief manifested on that occasion amounted to a positive disbelief, it was certainly not consequent on prolonged and serious reflexion. Adverse opinions were precipitated by bias; those who were swayed by prejudice were quick to disallow. And this unbelief of prejudice is again met with in the case of elders and chief priests and scribes as they question Jesus in their council (Lk 22<sup>96-68</sup>). The reply which comes from Him is significant: 'If I tell you, ye will not believe' (οὐ μὴ πωτεύσητε); in the face of hostile and preconceived opinion further speaking would be to no receptiveness, power of discernment overcome for the time being by various emotions, knowledge limited, inability to apprehend that which is outside the sphere of previous experience. Thus Lk 2411 (και ήπίστουν αύταιs): where reports brought by the women are discredited as idle tales by disciples unable to grasp the idea of a life lived under new conditions. Their doubt becomes assurance; but a brain and the state of the state of the sudden gladness told of in Lk 24th (Δπιστούντων αὐτῶν ἀπὸ τῆς χαρῶς) renders it impossible to rise to a full apprehension of what is still the inexplicable. Despondency lies in the background of the unbelief and the state of the stat referred to in the appendix to the Second Gospel (Mk 16<sup>11.13</sup>); a despondency which, because yielded to, has sunk into a settled disinclination to be convinced. The thought here is of that stolid unbelief in which the heart is hardened and the mind unreceptive of spiritual truth (Mk 1614). And this incredulity of apathetic minds is perhaps noticeable in the attitude which 'the priests and the scribes and the elders' had adopted in the case of John the Baptist (cf. Mt 21<sup>22-27</sup>, Mk 11<sup>27-23</sup>).

If, on the one hand, there is an incredulity which Jesus reproves (Mk 16<sup>14</sup>), so, on the other hand, there is an incredulity which He not merely sanctions but enjoins. He makes large demands for faith, trust, belief; what He will not have is that mere credulity which bespeaks the inert mind, that superficiality which is ready to assent to anything. There is surely a depth and width of meaning in the μη πωτεύσητε addressed to the disciples in His recorded predictions (Mt 2423, Mk 1321); and the warning against false Messiahs may be equally a warning against perverted notions of Deity, false conceptions of religion. By implication, a demand is made that tests be applied, discrimination exercised. The reality of faith will then manifest itself in the deliberate rejection (disbelief) of whatever does not bear the hall-mark of eternal truth. 'Religion is belief—surely it requires little thought to see that religion is, or should be, belief in what is true' (A. T. Lyttelton).

There is an unbelief which is indicative of a want of knowledge. But along with it there is the desire to know, to rise to a fuller apprehension of that whereof already there is the dim perception. Faith shines out in it; faith which, up to a certain point, is strong, and which can even declare itself openly; at the same time there is a profound consciousness of infirmity and limitations. And this is strikingly exemplified in the father of the demoniac boy (Mk 9<sup>14-29</sup>); the unbelief which, realized by himself, he will not conceal from Jesus, has not deprived him of the capacity to trust. That he can, and does, trust is evident from his pathetic utterance (Mk 9<sup>24</sup> πιστεύω, βοήθει μου τῆ ἀπιστία). Pleading the compassion of Jesus instead of his own faith, he unconsciously shows a genuine faith (Gould, St.

(b) In the Fourth Gospel.—A characteristic feat-A group of passages may be taken next where the unbelief illustrated is, generally speaking, that of incredulity. But the incredulity is diverse: its explanations point to reasonable distrust, want of stand, and without raising questions dealt with elsewhere (see JOHN [GOSPEL OF]).

There is the conversation with Nicodemus. unbelief referred to by Jesus (Jn 312 και οὐ πιστεύετε) is the failure to apprehend, which involves spiritual unreceptiveness. No credence has been given to things which lie within the range of human experience; how then shall there be perception of truths which have their sphere in a higher order? A few verses further on there come the reflexions of the Evangelist, and here thought is directed to that from which such unbelief springs. Sharp is the contrast between the δ μη πιστεύων of v. 18 and the δ πιστεύων είς αὐτόν of its opening words; in the former case full adherence to the Son of God has been deliberately refused; that refusal has meant a rejection of the highest manifestation of God, which is ultimately traceable to an evil disposition, evil works. Of similar import are the comments of the Evangelist in 12<sup>97-40</sup>; the miracles wrought by Jesus had not indeed been denied, at the same time they had made but a transient impression, and had sometimes been attributed to the powers of darkness; of unreserved confidence in and full acceptance of Himself there had been none whatever. That it should be otherwise was, after all, impossible where perceptive faculties had been dulled and moral sense blunted. The unbelief manifested was but the effect produced by the abuse of religious privileges and failure to profit by a progressive revelation. To look back to 54 is to find precisely the same thought expressed by Jesus Himself. The long-continued education in Divine things had been all in vain for those Jews who had studied 'Moses' and yet remained blind to the progressive teaching of the OT. How then should they have ready acceptance for the One in whom another, and a higher, revelation had been given?

The attitude of the rulers referred to in 1242 43 demands consideration. It would seem that conviction had come to them; closer examination shows that it was a conviction of the intellect only; that, because of unworthy fears, it went no further, it found no outward expression in the life. 'This complete intellectual faith (so to speak) is really the climax of unbelief' (Westcott); and yet it may be capable of transformation, of passing into that larger faith which dominates the whole man. Possibly the case of Nicodemus may serve as illustration. It was an intellectual conviction that brought him to Jesus in the first instance (31.2); if he shrank then from publicity, he appears later on as one who has felt his way to an avowal of discipleship; the  $\tau \delta$   $\pi \rho \hat{\omega} \tau \sigma \sigma$  of 1950 is at least suggestive of repeated interviews and faith in process of development. Where there was the secrecy of the earliest visit there is at length the act of reverence done openly at the Cross.

It has become customary to speak of the 'doubt' of Thomas. 'Unbelief' would be the better word; for the attitude ascribed to him is rather suggestive of emphatic if tentative denial than of perplexity and hesitation. And yet it is not incompatible with an allegiance deep and strong to which all the stories told of him (in Fourth Gospel only) bear ample testimony. He is pictured as ready to go with Jesus to death (11<sup>16</sup>); the thought of separation from his Master (14<sup>5</sup>) has sorely distressed him; the crucifixion has dashed his hopes, but he will not sever himself from the company of the disciples (20<sup>26</sup>) although for him the assurance is wanting which has come to others (20<sup>25</sup>). For want of conclusive proof their glad tidings leave him unconvinced and so there comes that round him unconvinced, and so there comes that round disclaimer  $(\epsilon \lambda \nu \ \mu h) \ to \omega \ \dots \ o \nu \ \mu h \ \pi \iota \sigma \tau \epsilon \omega \sigma \omega$ ) which reveals his unbelief. And this attitude of his, how is it to be explained? Is it really the case that he is to be regarded as the 'rationalist among the Apostles'; that with him the reflective powers are stronger than the susceptive (see Robertson's sermon on The Doubt of Thomas, ii. 268); that he is one who will not be satisfied until all his grounds are estab-lished; that, ready to believe when he can, he is healthily averse from the belief of mere credulity; that his soul desires 'not a refuge but a resting-place' (Toynbee), and that he knows no security as long as there is one possibility of delusion left? The explanation is an attractive one, but it is doubtful whether it can be sustained in the face of the narratives above alluded to. They are scarcely suggestive of the highly speculative turn of mind. What they do betray is a gloomy temperament, a tendency to pessimism. Thomas is so constituted that he will always take the darker view of things. He simply cannot shake off the 'desponds and slavish fears' (Pilgrim's Progress) which weigh down his soul. Of himself he is incapable of gladsome belief; and yet, when assurance comes, he can rise to the great confession (2028). As the light breaks in upon him he can say his 'Farewell night, welcome day' with a full heart.

It is difficult, then, to see in Thomas one who will painfully think out truth in order that when once found it may be the more firmly grasped. Not, therefore, is he to be classed with those referred to in 448 (έὰν μὴ σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα ίδητε, ού μὴ πιστεύσητε). They stand on a far lower level. For with all his They stand on a far lower level. For with all his defects of character, Thomas has nothing shallow about him; nothing to suggest the undeveloped intellect. The Galikeans, on the other hand, would seem to be characterized by childishness. Like the emissaries of Vladimir, who reported in favour of Greek Christianity because the grand services at Constantinople had appealed to their imagination, they are to be reached only by that which strikes the eye. The faith to which they can rise is at best, a feeble faith. And yet, with one of UNCONSCIOUS FAITH .- Faith is a venture of the soul. In the highest instances the soul stakes its all, and if the faith proves vain, is then of all most pitiable; but if the venture be justified, discovers that it has lost itself only to find itself as never before, and so in its endurance the soul is Can faith thus understood be unconscious? Assuredly it can. On the one hand, ignorance may conceal the fact that any venture is involved; and, on the other hand, where the actual stake is known, it may be welcomed through sheer exuberance of spiritual vitality without any such reflexion on the risk as to make it a conscious venture. An investor may put his capital into some undertaking without knowing that it is a speculation, or he may do so because his native enterprise prompts him to seize an opportunity without reflecting that the best opportunities are connected with larger risks. And the soul which ventures faith may do so without consciousness of what it is doing, either because its knowledge of life is restricted, or because it acts from instinct rather than consideration. But usage gives to the expression 'unconscious faith' a wider scope than this its strictest meaning. A faith conscious of its own activity meaning.

may yet be unconscious of the person or fact on which it is actually set. The soul's venture may be made on the ground of an object of faith which is either unrecognized or unperceived, and which is yet, in point of fact, the ground of such a venture being made at all. Where the real object of faith does not come into consciousness, there is still warrant for calling this 'unconscious faith,' even though verbal exactitude might stickle at such phraseology. But when this degree of lati-tude is conceded, it ought not to be forgotten that the definition of 'unconscious faith' is made more difficult, not only in respect of its connotation, but of its denotation also. For the cases in which there is no consciousness of the true object on which faith rests, pass by imperceptible gradation into those in which there is some consciousness of the object, but no true perception of its real nature, and even into those in which the perception of this is markedly imperfect. But, of course, there are few cases of faith where this perception is anything like perfect; for not only is our knowledge usually very far from complete in matters spiritual, but where it is most nearly coextensive with the truth, least occasion is left, as a rule, for faith. Bearing all these limitations in mind, however, 'unconscious faith' stands for an experience by no means rare in human life, and of very great importance in the Kingdom of God. Our object must be to understand its nature, and to realize the place it holds, and has held, in the relations of mankind to Christ.

1. At the outset we must recognize fully Jesus Christ's constant requirement of faith from all who sought or needed His help, and His refusal to give help where this requirement was not met (Mt 13st). Lk 23<sup>k, b</sup>). Only so shall we appreciate the welcome He always showed for every sign of unconscious faith. 'He that is not against us is for us' (Mk 9") is a principle which recognizes what may be far short not only of full avowal, but also of conscious faith. It is obvious that in saying, 'I know that Messias cometh' (Jn 42), the woman of Samaria had little consciousness of the real meaning of her words, yet her imperfect faith drew the disclosure,
'I that speak unto thee am he.' Similarly the faith of the Syrophomician woman, who won the help she sought, can hardly have been conscious of what she was pleading for when she urged that 'even the dogs under the table eat of the children's crumba' (Mk 72). A more striking instance is that of the cripple who was cured of his infirmity on Christ's order to rise, of whom it is recorded that he that was healed wist not who it was' that had healed him (Ju 519). And to this the case of the blind man who received sight in Jerusalem is somewhat similar; for when the Lord afterwards confronted him with the question, 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God?' he was only able to reply, Who is he, Lord, that I may believe on him (9%). An instructive passage as to Christ's esti-mate of faith which is unconscious is Lk 11<sup>30-20</sup>. He was condemning the contemporary generation in Galilee for its want of faith shown in the re peated demand for a 'sign'. In contrast with this He set two instances of greater faith recorded in much earlier days where less night have been looked for. The first is that of the men of Ninevah, whose repentance on Jonah's appearance among them is told in the Book of Jonah; the second is that of the Queen of the South, whose visit to Solomon's court is picture-quely narrated in the Book of Kings. In the one case it is written, The people of Nineveh believed God, and they proclaimed a fast' (Jon 36); in the other the queen says: 'I believed not the words until I came . . . and, behold, the half was not told me'(1 K 10°). The credit given to the prophet's message, and to the fame of Solomon's wisdom, is taken as evidencing a deeper and unconscious faith in the righteous Glod who was judging the iniquity of the great city, and in the all-wise God whose inspiration was the source of the king's wonderful ability. And this unconscious faith of heathens is deemed worthy to shame and condemn the faithlessness of the generation which demurred to Christ's claims, and demanded signs.

2. There were times when the Lord Jesus put this point of view into express teaching with more of generality. Perhaps the words, 'If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed . . .' (Mt 17%) Lk 176), were not intended solely to suggest the diminutive size of the seed, but also the inert grain in which the life lies latent for the present, though hereafter it will become active and develop. At all events when 'he called to him a little child and set him in the midst' (Mt 182), bidding His disciples become as little children, no characteristic of childhood can have counted for so much in His mind as the spontaneous readiness to trust without limit where love is, which at the same time makes a child so wonderfully teachable, and gives it charm too apt to be robbed by increasing years. charm too apt to be roused by increasing year.
A child is the very personification of eager instinctive faith unconscious of itself. There were times too when Christ's gaze ranged wider, and He welcomed the unconscious faith in Himself of those who had never known an opportunity of trusting Him. Such was the case when the Greeks who were introduced by Andrew and Philip seemed to Him the first-fruits only of a far greater harvest, and He looked on to the time when, 'being lifted up,' He 'would draw all men unto himself' (Jn 12<sup>20</sup>). It is impossible to limit this forecast to cover those only who in time to come should consciously become His disciples. He has drawn, and is now drawing, many to Hinself who are unconscious of the power which is attracting them. And there seems to be a similar recognition of a widespread unconscious faith which needs to be made *Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold; them also I must lead, and they shall hear my voice' (Jn 10<sup>18</sup>). A still more remarkable recognition of an unconscious faith in Himself, in days long anterior to His manifestation in the world, is to be found in the saying, 'Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad' (Jn 801).

glad' (Jn 8<sup>80</sup>). The instance last cited opens out a view of the proposition character of the whole life history of israel, as it has been well called. Not Abraham alone, but all the prophets in larsel, and even all 'they that feared the Lord, and thought upon his name,' rejoiced to see Christ's day, and may it with jox, for all of them are included in the Divine surjay, 'They shall be intend to them are included in the Divine surjay, 'They shall be intend to the marker of Divine truth, of spiritual his was discribed in the day which I do make, even a peculiar treasure (Mai 18.17). For whatever of Divine truth, of spiritual his was discribed in those carliers agas, was just as much of the revelation of Hoffmade in Jesus Christ His Son. He 'was the light of men 'and those who may His light may Him, and rejoined to see Him. This, of crettne, was the real nature of prophes the was not its function to be predictive of historical detail before the event, but to discreme and disclose the unseen and eleminate in the things that were seen and temporal. Insantum has the derivable bloogs to no one epinch more than another the teaching of the prophets was bound to find its realization in after times so far as it concerned their with the rival principles and lawn of spiritual life; and to this extent it was predictive in what concerned 'the deep things of God!' But the special power of spiritual life; and to this extent it was predictive in what concerned 'the deep things of God!' But the special power of prophers was insight, not foresight. The, however, was of nessmith both preparators and anti-pators are with revealation of God was an evolution in time. So the prophets are accurately described by St. Feter as 'searching for what or what manner of season, the spirit of Christ who has no them was all missing protesting before hand of the a ferings destined for Christ (as at Nosea) and the glories that should follow them' (I P 11). The faith of the prophets was thus an une one-cloud fasth in Christ two less truly than it ye may have life' (Ju 5.50 40). And among His own disciples, beganning from Moses and from all the prophets, be interpreted to them in all the britgures the things concerning himself' (Lk 242, cf. 24446).

There are two sections of the NT in which this idea of unconscious fasth is devel ped at some length, and given the emphasis which its importance deserves. The more obvious is in the Episite to the lifetices, in the great rull-ail of those some of fasth in many ages who were 'looking unto the Pioneer and Perfecter of faith, even Jesus' (He 123). Of these it is written that they 'tall died in fasth, not making received the promises, but having seen and greeted their from star, and having on fusied that they were strangers and solourners on the earth (110, cf. vv. 26.9). The faith by which they lived and u. which they died was no doubt a more or less distinctly conscious faith in God and in the unseen world, but the writer of the Epistle is not content to view it so. To his eyes it was also an unconscious faith in Jesus Christ, who alone embodies faith in the come ious perfection, and is linuself the ultimate ground of its reality in all. The other, and the deeper treatment, is in St. Paul's later Epistles. In his archiev writings there are occasional passages in which the same thought is expressed, cii 'They drank of a spiritual Rock that followed them, and the Rock was the Christ' (Lo 109); but it is only in the Epistles to the Colosians and Ephemans that it Faul disclosses his whole mind. It these he livells with enthusiasm on 'the mystery which hat been his from all uges and generations which is Christ in you (touclase), the hope of glory (to 126.7, cf. Eph 31.7). St. Paul is not so deeply moved by the thought of a secret kept out of sight in the Irvine counsels, while for a a,cs near were being destroyed for lack of knowledge, and only disclosed at the last. God's purpose, he felt, was an eternal purpose, and if aslave with the reach of healing and heave and man, though the on unconscious faith as yet. And UNDERSTANDING. - 1. over-idval, -cole, adj. eros (priv. doveres), to bring one thing alongsule of another : (1) for combat ; (2) metaph , for critical of another; (1) for combat; (2) metaph, for critical comparison, 'to bring the outward object into connexton with the inward sense' (Liddell and Scott), 'to put the perception with the thing perceived' (Gramm Thayer), to 'apprehend the bearings of things' (Lightfoot, Col.). The typical passage is Mit 13th #, where the exact significance is distinctly brought out. The bearer 'by the wayside differs from 'him that was sown upon good ground in this, that the former 'understandeth not' while the latter 'understandeth', the former does not apprehend 'understandeth' sthe former does not apprehend the bearing of what he hears on practical conduct, the latter sees the bearing and acts accordingly. The former 'does not recognize himself as standing in any relation to the word which he hears or to in any relation to the word which he hears or to the kingdom of grace which that word proclaims? (Trench, Parables, in loc.), while the latter does so recognize. In v. st. concluding the series of parables, Jesus asks His distiples if they have approbabled the meaning of all that He has said. In the same sense (Mt 17<sup>13</sup>) the osciples have, by the exercise of their critical faculty, recognized that in speaking of Elias, Jesus was in fact referring to the Baptist. Hence the contrast between our and other words ago sir, Mt 13<sup>13</sup> to 13, 25 Mk 74, Lk 89, the sound of the word spoken fall ing on the ear contrasted with the exercise of such erithism as leads to the apprehending of its personal bearing: socio, Mk 80, perceiving contrasted with carnest reflexion. A comparison of Mt 16  $^3$ with Mk 8n is interesting, Mt. representing the ciples were unwilling to admit the idea of suffering disciples as having recognized on further consideration, while Mk, gives 'a stimulating question which leaves the Twelve to think out for themselves' the comparison of leaven with teaching (Swete, in Ior.). Similarly, Mk 62 (RV, 'considered' AV) of the miracle of the loaves and the walking on the sea; 'debuerant a pane ad mare concluders' (Bengel). Lk. employs the word less frequently than Mt. or Mk. In 2<sup>30</sup> 18<sup>34</sup> 24<sup>36</sup>, where it occurs in the narrative, the meaning of apprehending the significance of the word spoken, recogmizing its bearing on the circumstances (the musion of Jeans, the crucifixion, and the sufferings), is apparent. 8t. Paul's usage of the word cannot be overlooked. It is in strict harmony with that of the thorpels. See especially Col 19, where he combines 'understanding with 'wordom' in his prayer, and Eph 3 of 'the mystery of Christ,' 5-7 of 'the will of God' (Eph 116 kinswar is a disputed reading). See Lightfoot, Col., where Aristotle's definition is expounded.

In other cases y is rendered by 'know,' and it is difficult to find a reason for not adhering to that rendering in these y, differs from our, in so far that while our generally marks an antitheas to sense percep-tion,  $\gamma$ , marks an advance upon it. Procecupation with lower thoughts, self-complacency excluding apprehension of spiritual truths, present circumstances obscuring the full significance and neces-stating a further enlightenment by new circumstances and prolonged pondering, binder this advance. Only when these difficulties are removed can one come to know the higher aspects of the reality. (For the thought, compare In 2<sup>22</sup> 13<sup>7</sup> 14<sup>26</sup>) aγ (Gospels only Mk 9<sup>27</sup> Lk 9<sup>46</sup>) preserves this idea of advance, 'there was a Divine purpose in their temporary ignorance' (Swete). The disand death, and the rebuke administered to Peter made them afraid to ask questions; thus they remained ignorant for a time.

UNDRESSED CLOTH.—1. Ingredients in dressing.—The principal cleansing agents were two kinds of crude alkali salt.—(a) Mineral. This consisted of the natural deposits, chiefly in Egypt, of potassium or sodium carbonates. It was the Heb. nether, Arab. natrún, EV (incorrectly) 'nitre,' RV 'lye' (Jer 2<sup>22</sup>). White clay was also used, chiefly as a detergent or scrubbing agent.—(b) Vegetable. This was obtained chiefly from the soap plant called in Arabic ishnan, growing on the desert plains of Syria. When burnt, it yields a crude substance named kali in Arabic, corresponding to the Heb. borith, 'soap' (Mal 32).

2. Process of dressing.—(a) For cotton and linen.
The cleansing of these was carried out after the cloth had been woven. The present custom in Syria is to dip the cloth in water, and lay it out on a flat surface of rock. It is then sprinkled with natrán (lye) or kali (soap), and beaten with rods or clubs, and is finally rinsed in fresh water and spread out under the sun to dry.

(b) For wool. On account of the presence of natural oil and many accretions and impurities in the fleece, the cleaning had to be done before the cloth was woven. For this the chief in-gredient was urine collected and kept till it formed ammonium carbonate during putrefaction. Because of the offensive odours of such cleansing agents, as well as on account of the free space needed for drying purposes, the fullers' establishments were placed near or outside the city walls. The wool was further purified in several changes of water containing the lye or soap already mentioned, and was finally rinsed in running water.

(c) For silk. This also had to be treated before being woven, in order to remove from the thread the gluey substance called sericin (fr. σηρικόν, Rev 1812), which not only gave off an offensive odour, but, if allowed to remain, would make the cloth hard and lustreless. To remove this, the silk fibre had to be kept for several hours in a bath of hot water containing soap made of olive oil and alkali salt. This process tested the skill of the fuller; for if the soaking were insufficient, some of the sericin still adhered to the silk fibre, and if prolonged beyond a certain point it imparted an indelible yellow stain. The raw silk was then indelible yellow stain. transferred for a short time to a bath of water in which dog or pigeon dung had been mixed, and, as in the case of the other materials, the last stage was a thorough washing in pure water.

The eye-witnesses of our Lord's majesty in the Mount (Mk 9<sup>2-8</sup>) testified that on that occasion the white radiance of His garments was beyond the art of any fuller on earth.

3. Christ's parabolic use of undressed cloth.— In Mt 9<sup>16</sup> Mk 2<sup>21</sup> Christ, in reply to the question of the disciples of John the Baptist as to why His disciples did not fast, employs the figure of a piece of undressed cloth (ράκοι ἀγναφον) sewed on an old garment, to show the incongruity between fasting according to rule and the new spirit of Christianity. ἐάκος (fr. ἐἡγνυμ, 'to break') is properly a piece of cloth torn off, cf. Eng. 'rag'; ἀγναφος (fr. a privative and γνάπτω, 'to full or dress cloth' [whence γναφεύς, 'a fuller,' Mk 9³]) = 'unfulled,' 'undressed.' Neither of the Gr. words occurs elsewhere in NT. In the parallel passage Lk 5³6, where, however a somewhat different turn is given to the however, a somewhat different turn is given to the saying, ιμάτιον καινόν ('new garment') occurs instead of ράκος άγναφον. By the rendering 'undressed cloth' RV brings out the point of the original, which is quite lost in the colourless 'new cloth' of AV, though suggested by the 'raw or unwrought' of AVm. A piece of cloth that is undressed or A piece of cloth that is undressed or unfulled is certain to shrink with a wetting, and so to strain and tear away the old garment to which it is sewed. Thus, as Christ said, it 'taketh from the garment, and a worse rent is made.' For the religious significance of the saying see esp. Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, p. 302 ff. Cf. also artt. BOTTLE in vol. i., and LAW, above, p. 12b.

G. M. MACKIE AND J. C. LAMBERT. UNION .-- 1. Union of the world with God .-- In a sense the creation is always closely related to the Creator, and has no separate, independent existence: 'thy heavens' (Ps 83), 'in him we live, and move, and have our being' (Ac 1728). Yet it is in a relative independence of the creation that all things happen. Hence we read in Eph 110 and Col 120 that God will gather together all things in Christ, and will reconcile all things unto Himself. This is spoken in reference to the human spirit and its salvation. By the redemption of man, God will perfect the relationship of the creation to Himself. All things are so linked together that God's approach to the human race, and His causing of the human race to approach to Him in Christ, is also a drawing of the whole world into a more perfect union with God.

2. Union between God and the human race.—It is only from the human side, and as matter of history, that we can study the union into which God has progressively entered with the spirit of man. It is the effect of any religious exercise that is matter of observation. Thus we are made aware of the dawning consciousness of God in the human spirit; 'then began men to call upon the name of the Lord' (Gn 428). Those who were receptive above their fellows of the Divine influence were prophets (Dt 1815, 1 S 99). This being the case, we are led to postulate and believe in a corresponding communication on the part of God towards men, and to observe its development (see REVELATION). The history of Israel was so shaped by providences, and spiritual progress was so determined by prophecy, that Christ was prepared for, and came (Gal 44), and in Him the union of God with our race was perfected (Is 714 810).

In regard to the union of God with man in Christ, the emphasis in Scripture is not laid upon the manner of that union so much as upon the fact of it. If Creeds and Catechisms seem to do otherwise, it is still to be remembered that their chief concern is to establish the fact that God was in Christ. In Ph 2<sup>5-11</sup> St. Paul says nothing of the manner of the union of the Divine and human natures in Christ, but accepts as assuredly true that He was God with us, and that the same Per-son who emptied Himself and took the form of a servant, also humbled Himself and became obedient even unto death, yea the death of the cross.

When we turn to the narrative of Christ's words in the Gospels, we find that His attitude towards God was ethically perfect, as of a Son to a Father, in obedience, sympathy, comprehension, honour, love, trust (Mt 11<sup>25-27</sup>, Jn 5<sup>19. 20</sup> 6<sup>57</sup> 10<sup>30</sup> 11<sup>41</sup>, Lk 23<sup>46</sup>, and many other passages). This is what we are permitted to see of the relationship between God and Christ. But the Son who so manifested His oneness with the Father did so in our human nature. Here therefore is humanity in the person of its Head seen to be in union with God. So far as every OT saint was able to anticipate and prefigure Christ, so far this union between God and man was a process which was progressively unfolded and perfected. And so far as believers by fellowship with Christ enter into His relationship with God, the union between God and our race is still being realized; and it must always take the form perfectly set forth by Christ (1 Jn 4/1)

3. Union between believers and Christ.—It is necessary that individual souls should be united by faith to Christ, if the union of mankind with God is to be general (Jn 10<sup>16</sup> 12<sup>32</sup>). The Gospels record how in process of events men became disciples of Christ (Jn 1<sup>37</sup>, Mk 1<sup>18</sup>). That which was so effected was afterwards in many ways confirmed (Jn 6<sup>36</sup> 20<sup>22</sup>), and is described in the parable of the Vine and its Branches (ch. 15). Again, those who believed when the Apostles preached, and to whom the Spirit was given, without being personally attached to Christ in His earthly life, nevertheless became partakers of spiritual union with Him (Ac 11<sup>17</sup>. See also He 3<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 1<sup>9</sup>, 1 Jn 1<sup>3</sup>). This union of the believer with Christ is more than the tie between a disciple and a teacher, and is expressed by the words 'in Christ,' 'in the Lord,' 'in him,' which occur more than 150 times in the NT, notably in 2 Co 5<sup>17</sup> (RVm) and Ro 16<sup>7</sup>. As this union is entered into by trust and obedience and full consent, so it consists of identity of interests and companionship in everything. In the region of the conscience, union with Christ gives peace (Ro 8<sup>1</sup>); in that of the will, regeneration (Gal 2<sup>30</sup>); in regard to our activity, 'we are labourers together with God' (1 Co 3<sup>9</sup>, 2 Co 6<sup>1</sup>); and in regard to all events, we are sharers with Christ in suffering and in glory (Ro 8<sup>17</sup>, 2 Ti 2<sup>12</sup>; see also Jn 17<sup>20-24</sup>).

4. Union of believers with one another.—The Lord's Supper is the simplest and most perfect outward expression of the union of Christians with one another, because of their common attachment to Christ, and deriving of benefit from Him. Thus in Ac 2th 20<sup>7</sup>, 1 Co 10<sup>16</sup> 1<sup>7</sup> it is assumed that heartunion with Christ and with one another went along with the outward expression of that union, in their partaking of the same significant bread. The obedience of the soul to Christ which alone constitutes any one a disciple may or may not coincide with participation in this or any other outward observance. Yet, like the kernel and the containing shell of a nut, they as a matter of fact appeared and developed together. Union with Christ produces an attachment of loyalty to Him, and to everything that belongs to Him; besides also the fruits of Christ-like character, which are in their nature unifying: 'The glory thou gavest me I have given them, that they may be one' (Jn 17<sup>22</sup>). Should this unity be broken, the remedy is that all parties should renew their allegiance to Christ (1 Co 1-3, 2 Co 10<sup>7</sup>).

Christ (1 Co 1-3, 2 Co 107).

Union among believers is compared to the organic unity of a body (Ro 124, 1 Co 1212, Eph 44). This has not the effect of ignoring the differences between believers; on the contrary, the fullest provision is made for differences of gift. So far from the eye ceasing to be specifically an eye, because the body has hands and feet, there is the more need of the eye, and it has more work to do. Individuality is to be conserved and strengthened, and not destroyed or weakened. The case taken for comparison is not that of the failure of the eye to see, when the hand would do its best to aid the eye, and do its work; but such a healthy state of things as would allow every sense to do its own work. At the same time, all are under the law of love to Christ and to one another, and are sensitive to each other's suffering or success, and their life is wholly directed to mutual helpfulness. The result is that each is exercised in the use of whatever gift he has, and the whole society is maintained in spiritual vigour and growth (Eph 412, Phil 4). See also Oneness, Unity.

UNIQUENESS.—Beyond dispute Christ appears on the theatre of human history as a unique Personality. In however large a sense He may be revealed as sharing the lot and the nature of men, He stands forth as the possessor of traits which have never been duplicated. Let a parallel be drawn between Him and any other who has won renown in human annals, and it will be found that the points of unlikeness more than match the points of likeness.

points of likeness. 1. In several respects the self-consciousness which the Gospels show to have been resident in Christ was of a unique kind. (1) We look in vain throughout their records for any indication that the recognizes the common call to repentance as applying to Himself. No utterance that is put into His mouth conveys a hint that the slightest shadow of condemnation ever rested upon His spirit. He speaks as if He felt Himself to be the channel rather than the needy recipient of grace, as if, in truth, His inner life was as stain-less as it was assumed to have been in Apostolic thought. (2) Again, the self-consciousness of Christ appears to have been of a unique type as including a perfectly clear and marvellously potent sense of sonship towards God. So rounded is the filial ideal which He presents that it is impossible to find a point at which it admits of supplement. Who can imagine a more complete expression of filial trust than that which is contained in His precepts on putting away every anxious care about the stores which the morrow may bring (Mt 6<sup>25-24</sup>||)? Who can conceive of filial devotion ascending to a higher stage than was made manifest in words, 'Not my will, but thine be done' (Lk 2242 ||), spoken in the presence of the most bitter cup of shame and suffering? Who can think of filial intimacy more close and constant than is attested by the whole body of Christ's words and deeds? In truth, it is impossible to review the record without being struck with the aptness of the Evangelical description which speaks of Him as the 'beloved Son' (Mt 3<sup>17</sup> ||) and as dwelling 'in the bosom of the Father' (Jn 1<sup>18</sup>). (3) Still further, a unique order of self-consciousness is disclosed in the pronounced sense of an extraordinary mediatorial vocation which was characteristic of 'No man cometh unto the Father but by me' (Jn 146)—that is the strong declaration which the Fourth Gospel places upon His lips; and a full equivalent is supplied by the other Gospels in such sentences as these: 'The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many' (Mt 2023). All things have been delivered unto me of my Father; and no one knoweth the Son save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him' (Mt  $11^{27}$ ||). To what prophet or leader of the race beside have we any warrant for imputing such a conception of personal vocation? Surely it must be admitted that in His sense of the prerogative and the burden of mediation Christ makes a class by Himself; He has no peer or companion. (4) Once more, the unique character of Christ's self-consciousness is seen in His extraordinary sense of authority or rightful lord-hip. While He came not to be ministered unto, He still made it evident that in the depths of His spirit there was an unhesitating affirmation of a pre-eminent royalty. He spoke as one who needed not to accommodate His words precisely to the instructions of Moses or to any other ancestral standard. He

self-consciousness 2. Almost rivalling the impression which comes from a consideration of the exceptional self-consciousness in Christ is that which is properly derived from a contemplation of the union and reconciliation in Him of strongly contrasted traits. (1) He was unique in His combination of meekness with the fullest energy and force of character. With quietness of mind He accepted the yoke of parental and national requirements. He submitted to a consecration rite at the hands of one who declared that he was not worthy to unloose the latchet of His shoe (Jn 1<sup>27</sup> ||). In all His conduct there was no trace of aristocratic superiority; among all His mighty works no deed that savoured of ostentation. But while He was meek and lowly of heart, He was masterful and commanding, inflexible in purpose, remote from weak conciliation, perfectly resolute to march against a perverse generation, to confront its frown, its mockery, and its homicidal hatred. (2) Again, Christ exemplified the union of tender compassion for the sinner with sharp intolerance for sin. He was neither moved by the depth of His compassion to make unguarded allowances for the transgressor, nor incited by His intense repulsion against sin to lose the brother in the censor. In dealing with erring souls that had any longing for better things He fulfilled the prophetic picture of one who should not break the bruised reed or quench the smoking flax (Is 42°, cf. Mt 1220). At the same time, He showed Himself the absolutely uncompromising enemy of unright-eousness, insisting that it must be excluded from the thoughts as well as from the deeds, and requiring that the offending right hand should be cut off and the offending right eye be plucked out (Mt 5<sup>302</sup>). Tender as the dew where there was any place for a healing ministry, He was yet sharp and unsparing as the lightning against every form of iniquity.

(3) In another respect also Christ exhibited a unique ability for reconciling diverse traits. We see in Him a remarkable union of spirituality with kindly contact with the world. He knew how to be unworldly without being ascetic; how to throw the weight of emphasis upon the treasure laid up in heaven without patronizing any eccentric form of self-denial. He ministered to bodily needs as well as to the needs of the spirit. Herald as He was of the Kingdom of heaven, He yet stood in sympathetic relation with the sensible world, treated it as the workmanship of His Father's hands, and used it as a book of divinity from which to read to His hearers most beautiful and comforting messages of truth.

3. Corresponding to this extraordinary balance of the various traits of ideal character, Christ showed a unique competency as a teacher to bring into a unity the diverse orders and interests of truth. In the standard of life which He set before His disciples He reconciled loftiness with simplicity. The standard is undoubtedly very high. It towers above the average level of human living like an Alpine summit. But with all its loftiness it is peculiarly free from the strained and the unnatural. Its attainment involves no sacrifice of manhood or swamping of the true self, but rather just the achievement of manhood and the realization of the true self. Rebuking nothing that is purely and truly human, it requires only that the human should come to its best by standing in the transfiguring light of intimate associa-tion with the Divine. A great reconciling function is also fulfilled by Christ's teaching in the just tribute which it pays at once to morality and to religion, and in the indissoluble union which it assumes to subsist between them. From the standpoint of that teaching no man is a fit subject to bring a gift to God's altar until he has done his utmost to establish right relations with his fellows (Mt 5<sup>282</sup>). No man is an acceptable petitioner for the Divine clemency until he is willing to forgive the one who has trespassed against himself (Mt 6144). Ceremonial scrupulosity and ecclesiastical performances count for nothing apart from the intention and the habit of righteous dealing. They are no better than a counterfeit appearance, a whitewash upon the sepulchre (Mt 23"). Religion divorced from morality is a delusion and a pretence. But, on the other hand, the teaching of Christ is vastly remote from contentment with a bare morality or discharge of the common duties of man to man. The presence of the Heavenly Father lay about Him like a radiant atmosphere. To do the will of that Father He regarded as the prime necessity of His life, His very meat (Jn 4<sup>34</sup>). In the assurance of the Father's complacent love He found the unfailing spring of consolation and rejoicing, and the return of His heart in fervent love to the all-perfect One He counted the most obvious and the sweetest of all conceivable obliga-tions. Accordingly, it could not but come about that His teaching should be thoroughly transfused with a religious element, with the thought of Divine relationships. From beginning to end it is beautifield and illumined by lofty and intense religious convictions. In short, stress upon the ethical factor is not permitted in the least degree to diminish the emphasis rendered to the religious factor in man's life. The harmonious combination of the two makes one of the fairest and most fruitful ideals that has been brought to the attention of the race.

UNITY.—In the NT the term 'unity,' like its Gr. equivalent ἐνότης, occurs only in Eph 4<sup>3.13</sup>—both times with reference to the unity of the Christian Church (v.³ 'the unity of the Spirit,' v.¹² 'the unity of the faith'). But the idea of the unity of the Church as the 'body of Christ' is one that constantly meets us both in positive and in negative forms—in connexion, i.e., alike with exhortations to Christian unity and with the deprecation and rebuke of schism or of the divisive spirit.

St. Paul in 1 Cor. (118 1118 1225) is the first to use 'schism' (xxiepsa) with an approach to its present technical meaning. The xxiepsan, however, which he condemns are parties only in the Church, not sects; 'strifes,' but not separations. There is no suggestion that those who called themselves 'of Paul' had ceased to communicate with those who called themselves 'of Apollos' (113). The 'divisions' apparent in their meetings for worship (1118-21) were of class, of richer and poorer (v.25), and did not prevent the common meeting. The 'schism' deprecated in his parable of body and members (1225) amounts only to carelessness of mutual interest; solution of continuity in the body of Christ is not contemplated. The word aipsus (EV sect, 'heresy') comes nearer in NT use to the idea of 'sect,' though it does not reach it. It still denotes any party or faction within a single communion, as of the Sadducees (Ac 517), of the Pharisees (155 268), or of Christians considered as a school of Judaism (248 14 2822). It goes no farther in Gal 529, where aipsus are counted among works of the flesh, as the natural sequence of indian and digestration. In 2 P 21 they are the secret work of pseudoprophets, and are aip. &vanhus; but there is no suggestion that they amounted to separations: they work 'among you.' The strongest expression used on the subject is that of St. Juda (t. 13), who speaks of some as asshape(serve, 'marking themselves off 'from their fellows, but apparently only in tone and conduct—there was no interruption of formal fellowship the murmurers atill 'feasted' with the Church, and were present at its aparent. The Nucolastans (Rev. 25-15) were a party within the Uhurch, not a separation from it. The idea of communious severally arranged upon differing bases of opinion or order does not exist within the NT thought. What is conceived as possible, only to be reprobated, is the tendency to faction, or the spirit of party, or the 'divisive course'; as for actual schimm—as yivers.

1. Our Lord's personal teaching on the subject is positive, not negative: He inculcates unity rather than forbids division—It is to be gathered (1) from His example, (2) from His recorded sayings.

(1) The condition of religion in the Jewish

(1) The condition of religion in the Jewish commonwealth of His time was profoundly unsatisfactory to Him. It called forth His sharp rebuke. Its teachers, their doctrine and their practice, in curred His denunciation. The Temple demanded cleansing at His hands; the synagogues were in possession of those scribes and lawyers and Phartsees on whom He cried 'Woe,' as hypocrites. Nevertheless, He bads His disciples respect their authority and obey their ordinances—always without imitating their conduct. They 'sit in Moses' seat' (Mt 23'), a seat self-assumed,—their office had no recognition in the Law,—but in a sense they represented the prophetic succession, and de facto stood for constituted order. Christ neither separated Himself, nor allowed others to separate, on the ground of their corruption, error, or abuse of power; though He recognized that all these existed, and protested against them. His custom was to go up to the synagogue on the Sabbath days. He observed the Feasts of the Temple, that of the Dedication (which had only customary sanction) as well as those prescribed. His example suggests no extremity of circumstance under which separation from the Divine Society becomes the course of duty.

(2) His express teaching is as emphatic as the circumstances permit us to expect. He establishes Kingdom which in time and place is to be represented by the Ecclesia which He will build upon the confession of Himself (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>). The essential unity of the Kingdom necessarily reflects itself in the unity of the representative society. Unity is involved in the fact that its bond is a relation to Himself: the one Shepherd implies the one flock, the one door implies the one fold (Jn 11<sup>19,19</sup>). It is presented under similes which convey the idea of unity: it is one building on one foundation (Mt 16<sup>19</sup>), one enclosed vineyard (20<sup>1-14</sup>), one shoul taken in a single net (13<sup>27,48</sup>), one company of watchers (25<sup>1-19</sup>), or of guesta at one feast (Lk 14<sup>7-24</sup>); it is a perfect century of sheep, a complete sum of money, and the breaking of its completeness is intolerable

Its unity is primarily theological, necessitated by its causation in the unity which is in God (Jn 17<sup>11, 21</sup>), and objectively effected by the indwelling in its constituents of the one Christ (17<sup>22</sup>). The subjective unity in mutual affection of which Christians are conscious is a result of this objective unity, and is evidential of their common relation to Christ (Jn 13<sup>25</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>14, 18</sup>); but that sense of unity does not constitute the bond which unites Christians; the bond is antecedent to the sense of it, and stands in the life of Christ transfused through the discipleship. This transfusion of life is effected by the mission of the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost mediated by Christ in Autal unity of Christ with the recipients of the Paraclete; which is comparable to that of a single organism (the True Vine, 15<sup>1-9</sup>) in which the mitudual inheres by the fact of his inherence in Christ (15<sup>6-7</sup>). So much our Lord declares of His own operation; for the rest, He implies that He is un measure, in this as in all, dependent for the realization of His purpose on our apprehension of it and co-operative obedience. Undoubtedly He desires that the vital and spiritual unity which He effects should have a concrete expression such expression as is apprehensible, not only to the spiritual man discerning spiritual things (1 Co 201-14), but to the world, which cannot receive the Spirit (Jn 1417), and is aware of that only which with eyes of flesh it sees. He commands us, as a condition of the world's recognition of our disciplechip, to love one another 'as I have loved you' (13<sup>24</sup>). He prays the Father that we may be one in such fashion that the world, seeing it, may believe in His mission: and defines this unity as comparable to His own unity with the Father. Beyond question He demands a unity manufested in terms of the common understanding of the man of this world. He prays, not that believers may be 'at one' (in harmony of faith or temper -or as Abraham and Lot were at one in agreeing to part peaceably), but that they may be 'one thing,' be work for [711, 21, 22]; 'completed into one thing' [1722]. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that this 'one thing' is, spiritually, the Kingdom which His Incarnation brings among us (Lk 17"); representatively, the Society which He builds (Mt 16"), to which by His institution the one Baptism (Eph 4") admits, and which the one Bread (1 Co 1017) shows. Every kingdom, He says, divided against itself (the Kingdom of heaven is included in the argument) is brought to desolation; every city or house (the City of God, the House built of living stones, is included) divided against itself shall not stand (Mt 122, Mk 322). The unity which our Lord teaches appears, then, to be a visible and organic unity, based upon a vital unity in the Holy Ghost, and necessary both for evidence and for stability. His verdict upon schism, as the interruption of such unity, must be inferred—it is nowhere stated. -from the sanctions assigned to unity, and from the intensity of His supplication that it may be realized in the experience of His Church.

2. In this sense the Apostolic writers have understood Christ. It is noted that the disciples were 'all with one accord in one place' to receive the Spirit (Ac 2); that, as the result of Pentecost, they 'were together, and had all things common' (2<sup>td</sup>); 'the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and of one soul' (4<sup>tz</sup>). The assumption of the Epistles is that 'the saints' anywhere are 'the church of God' which is there (Ro 1<sup>t</sup>, 1 P 1<sup>t</sup> etc). If they are 'churches,' they are not less one fellowship in the unity of Christ (Gal 1<sup>t</sup>, Rev 1<sup>t</sup>). St Paul is copious on the subject. The unity

St Paul is copous on the subject. The unity on which he insists is not only of spirit; it is also embodied unity. Many as we are, we are one loaf and one body, being partakers of the one sacramental food (1 to 10th; if Ind 1x 4). The one Spirit makes us one body, and members one of another (1 to 12th), 'that there should be no schoom in the body.' The unity of the Spirit is to be guarded in the bond of peace—'one body, one Spirit,' as there is unity in every basis of our life (Eph 3th). This body is the Body of Christ, and requires for its attainment to completion the harmonious interworking of every member and group, as constituting a single organism in which

The possible exception is where (Mt. **a**). Lk 12**) Thrist threatens the evil servant who similes his fellow-servants and cats and drinks with the drunken that He will come and cut bith satisfier ($\delta_{\text{constant}} = \alpha_{\text{constant}} = \alpha_{\t all inhere (Eph 4 19-18). The Church is a Body, of which Christ in Head (Col 1st 20 20). It is 'the my story of Christ' that the Centiles should be of the same body with Israel (Eph 29). Baptism to into a unity to which nother race nor status nor can be a larrier (Gal 30 m). It is against first principles to assume the name of any leader as a jurity distinction (1 Co 12); to do so is 'oarnal' (32.9). God is to be giorified with one month, as well as with one mind (160.132.9). The Churchen of God have no contous of love of controversy (1 Co 112), God is not the author of confusion but, of pence; and so it is in all the Churches (14th). contentions carn indignation and wrath (Re 27); those who cause divisions are to be noted and discouraged (16<sup>27</sup>); a partisan after repeated admonition is to be rejected (Tit 3<sup>10</sup>). A Church is summended which follows other Churches already in Christ (1 Th 2"). Doubtful disputations are to be avoided; the weak to be borne with; uniformity of opinion on ouremental or ritual points is not to be insisted upon; to insist on uniformity may be 'to destroy the work of God' (Ro 14-18°). It becomes the gospel of love that man should stand fast in one spirit with one mind (Ph 1"); nothing is to be done through strife or vainglory—the guard of unity is humility (27); we are to do all things without murmarings or disputings, as childrun of God (21th).

st. Peter assumes the same general conception; stiffused as the Church is (1 P 1), it is one building, one priesthood, one nation (9th). St. John conceives of the Church as a followship with Apostles who have fellowship with God (1 Ja 1), united in love, which is to be in deed and truth, not is phrase (3th). The Epp. to the Churches of Ania deal with restiliate of symmetry more land destricts. conditions of corruption, moral and doctrinal; but there is no thought of self segregation as the duty of the faithful, even where deeds that Christ hates of the faithful, even where deeds that Christ hates are tolerated (Rev 2); He lays no other burden on His servants but to hold fast (2<sup>n-2n</sup>). The teaching of the RT, in fact, is positive. It shows a threefold entry of the Church; (1) As electron unity of origin and of vital relation of its constituent elements, which (like the racial unity constituent elements, which (like the range unity of blood) in constituted by the Divine act and exists antecedently to any action, for it or against it, of ours, to which we may do violence, but which we cannot abrogate; and which is the Church's spiritual onenean. (2) A social unity, the result and therefore the manifestation of this common Divine life, which is related to the life communicated in the Holy Spirit as the physical organism of the individual is to the personal life which co-ordinates that of its component calls, one body for one spirit; which (being body) may be wounded, but only with suffering and to its hurt and ventioning (3) A unity of temper and inten-tion, of concent in belief and thought, which it rents with us to supply; which is the co-operation with the Divine action that is required of us, -obedience to the law of the nature of the Body of Christ in which we find ourselves the hond of peace in which we are to observe (repris) the unity of the Spirit (Eph 49). The existence of a state of schism is not contemplated in the NT, nor is any direction given for conduct in such a case. Party spirit and divisive courses are condumned, but there is 'ne precept for the regulation of the relations of one sect to another.' The Apostolic doctrine as to schinn can be inferred only from those facts.

UNIVERSALISM .- Three different, though conmented, problems are raised by this word: (1) The universality of Christianity as a gospel for all rares (as against the early Ebionism (wh. see) which confined Christianity to the circumcised); (2) the universal purpose of Christ's death—for 'all men' (as against the Augustinian and Calvinistic doctrine of Christ's death on behalf of those elected out of the mass of sinful mankind); (3) the ultimate calvation of all souls (as against the eternal suffering of the wicked; or, their destruction; or perhaps as against uncertainty subjective uncertainty, due to our ignorance, or objective uncertainty, due to the indefauteness of the sentence of the Great Day; see below). A study of Christ and the Gospels is very specially concerned with the first problem.

very specially concerned with the first problem.

I. UNIVERSALITY OF CHRISTIANITY. 1. There are two ways in which religious qualify as 'universal.' They may reveal the missionary impulse (Zoroastrianism? see Jackson, Zoroaster the Prophet of Ancient Irus, 1899, p. 92; Modern Hindulsm, aucking up hill-tribes into its fellowship?). Or in addition they may simplify very greatly—in contrast with the legal or national character of developed systems of religion in the ancient world.

veloped systems of religion in the ancient world. Buddhism went furthest in the way of simplifying From the first, apparently, a proselyte might have the benefits of Buddhism without renouncing the practices of his former hith; and at this hour many of the population of China are mad to practise concurrently the three religions—Confucianism, Tabina, Buddhism. Muhamimadanism is missionary and is simple, but it institutes a new legalism in the strictest sense. Pre-Christian Judaism, in its proselytiang, revealed the missionary implies, but simplification of ritual—a simplified crace was hardly needed—could not be granted, unless to the missionary tensoure.

2. The Apostolic Church had the missionary impulse, but practised the OT law as inherited custom; was it also sacred duty? The question threatened to rend the new fellowship. Should the missionary impulse be given free scope? And should life be simplified—in the first instance, for those of Gentile birth—by abrogation of OT law? Or should the missionary impulse be slowly throttled by Jewish laws and customs. Both parties were pushed back, and led to define their principles more sharply. The Judaizers claim that the law is necessary to salvation (Ac 15¹), or at least to full salvation (Gal 3³). St. Paul justifies his attitude of antagonism by declaring that the Gentile Christian, who accepts circumcision and the Law is treated, not as customaty, but as religions in value—good religion to the Judaizers, bad religion to St. Paul (though in mere custom he himself became a Jew to win Jews.¹ Co 0²²). In the end the various sections of Christian Jews all died out, or merged themselves in the rival camps—the Synagogue and the Catholic Church. It may seem has if universalism failed—Christian Jews all died out, or merged themselves in the rival camps—the Synagogue and the Catholic Church. It may seem known to history as a Gentile and non-Jewish institution—a strange state of matters, were we not blinded by familiarity. And in other ways, too, success has been very partial. No religion, not even the Christian, has ever attained the destiny of universal sway to which all the higher prophetic religions aspire. Yet Christianity persists in claiming that it is truly universal. It excludes none. The Jewish people excludes itself. (Individual Jews, of course, are entangled in hereditary cu-tom, and can break away only by self-will or noral heroism.

3. The simplifying of religion, which was carried through in controversy by St. Paul, begins uncontroversially in the teaching of Jesus. He brings the Law to a principle (Mt 7") or to a pair of principles, drawn from different parts of the OT (Dt G, Lv 1918), and recognized by the Master as connected by an inward hieness (Mt 225" *") All these principles, of course, are moral and indifferent to ceremonial. So, too, the religious life is brought to a single principle by the name which Jesus steadily uses for God. If God is our Father, religion is sonship. This is a simplifying of the highest order—a simplifying which is also a deepening, an ennobling, a perfecting of the religious life. Thus Christ's teaching is universalist at the core. If religion consusts in the belief of God's Fatherhood and in love to man, there is no reason why a Jew should be preferred to a Gentile. Nor do corollaries from these principles fail to appear in the teaching of Christ. He rejects, as lacking Divine authority, that tradition (15° || ) by means of which the Pharisees, morally the most earnest among the Jews, safeguarded the OT law and applied it to new details, at the cost of making it ever more and more a burden. He hints repeatedly that ceremonies, even those taught by the OT, are of infarior moment in comparison with moral duty (9<sup>18-17</sup> 127, cf. 17° 22° ||). He speaks of sin and pardon (Mt 9° ||, Lk 7° ||), in words which send us back to the prediction of a 'new covenant' (Jer 31° ||). And thus He connects the new body of principles contained in His teaching with His own Person and destiny.

***. On the other hand, the universalist corollary itself seems strangely absent. For Christ conceives itself seems strangely absent. For Christ conceives His calling upon earth as confined to Israel (Mt 15%). His intercourse with Gentiles (850), or even with the half-heathen Samaritans (Jn 4°, Lk 960) 1714), was but casual. He bids His disciples, at 17"), was out casual. He bids his disciples, at their first going out, confine themselves to Jews (Mt 10°). All this, as we can see, was involved in His recognition that God called Him to be Messiah—Israel's king. If 'anointed' to 'preach' (Is 61°, Lk 4°), He must direct His prophetic message to Israel. The shaping out of His royalty depends, Israel. The shaping out of His royalty depends, under God, on the attitude of Israel in response to His appeal. These things are plain to us; still, there was room for doubt under the historic conditions of the early disciples. It was plausible for Jewish Christians to hold that the Master's example sanctioned particularism rather than universalism. Very possibly Mt 10—as borrowed by the author of our Gospel from an older document (the Logia? one version of the Logia?, see LogIa)—was originally a gathering together in a single context of sayings that might throw light on the permanent duties of an evangelist; if so, the original draft of the chapter confines the itinerant preacher to an audience of Jews. (We must not expect that Evangelists should write like critical historians, with exact notes of time and circumstance). On the other hand, our Gospel of Mt., as a whole, certainly presents a different outlook. Yet it is only after the Resurrection and, in all the Synoptics, with a very definite contrast to the past that we have the record of a positive command to preach to all men. Not that the mind of our Master is really an men. Not that the mind of our Master is really uncertain on this point. OT prophecy had extended hope to Gentiles (Is 2, s.g.); and Jesus stands higher, not lower, than His prophetic forerunners. Could He—speaking in the light of such promises; or could He at all preach a gospel universalist from its centre outwards, and not know what He was doing? He knew it well. And so the principles of His teaching come to their rights through the witness of St. Paul, who-in forms of his own, or, at any rate, in forms which owed to him their full and sharp development-vindicates the universal religion which has succeeded to the Old Covenant through the atoning death for sin. also arti Cosmopolitanism. 11. UNIVERSAL PURPOSE OF CHRIST'S PEATH

—1. Granted that Christ is the Saviour of all races, did He die for all men in all races, or only for such as actually reap the benefits of His sacrifice? The question may seem somewhat academic. It is admitted on both sides of the controversy that the merits of Christ suffice to redeem all men; and it is [or was; but see III. below] admitted on both sides that only a certain number of souls are advantaged by the Christian salvation. Still, it seemed—e.g. to Wesley—a new and ugly particularism to affirm that, by Divine decree, the salvation, professedly offered to all, was confined to some, chosen arbitrarily or upon unknown grounds.

2. In our Lord's Synoptic teaching, or in the very simple theology of the first three Evangelists, the point now before us is hardly touched on. Christ is to give His life a ransom for 'many' (Mt 20<sup>28</sup>||); and so, too, His covenant blood is shed for 'many' (26<sup>28</sup>||). The contrast in view is between the One suffering and the many saved. In Jn. the phenomena are more various. The shepherd gives His life for the sheep (Jn 10<sup>11</sup>). Christ loves His own (13<sup>1</sup>). He prays for them and not for the world (17<sup>9</sup>). On the other hand, the ulterior aim is 'that the world may believe' (17<sup>21</sup>(2<sup>30</sup>)). Lifted up, He is to draw 'all men' (12<sup>32</sup>). And, when we turn from the Johannine teaching of Christ to other parts of the Fourth Gospel, we find strong emphasis laid on the fact that Christ is the Saviour of the whole world (1<sup>29</sup> 3<sup>17</sup> 4<sup>43</sup>). A Gospel so penetrated with the thought of universalism (I.) was not likely to lend itself to a new particularism as against universalism (I.).

3. It is to St. Paul that the Augustinians and Calvinists look back as their explicit master. All that happens, happens by God's will. All that fails to happen, fails just because it was no part of God's purpose. Salvation, especially, is efficacious; grace is 'irresistible.' Predestinated—called—instified—clorified—the stately sequence moves on grace is 'irresistible.' Predestinated—called—justified—glorified—the stately sequence moves on without pause or uncertainty (Ro 8<sup>30</sup>). (We omit the initial term 'foreknown' as somewhat difficult—difficult perhaps to both schools of theology). What God plans, He accomplishes. The necessary obverse of this doctrine—unless transformed by universalism (III.); so Hastie, Theology of the Reformed Church, 1894—is that neither God nor Christ meant any blessing for those who are in the issue unsaved. Christ died for some, not for all. But the NT writes differently. Even St. Paul But the NT writes differently. Even St. Paul joins in the common confession—'He died for all' (2 Co 519). Language which in later theology is found characteristic only of transition Calvinism-i.e. of Calvinism in a state of decay, like Amyraldism-is the natural expression of the faith of St. Paul and of all the NT writers. True. A. Ritschl (Justification, vol. iii., tr. H. R. Mackintosh and A. B. Macaulay, ch. ii. § 22) contends that this form of expression is of inferior scientific value to the other set of expressions—noted by us in the Johannine teaching, and in Ro 8—according to which grace is destined to the Church. Ritschl's peculiar doctrine—the Elect—the Church and not =a body of individuals—has found few supporters, and probably will find fewer in the future. His preference for Calvinism is noteworthy, though he was no genuine Calvinist.* Yet we feel bound to hold that it is deeper spiritual vision and not simply lowered logical acumen that makes the NT writers—conceivably, sometimes, at the cost of systematic coherence—hail Christ as Saviour of all men. Otherwise, Universalism (I.) seems emptied of moral meaning. In point of fact, the Calvinistic limitation is little heard of now in Great Britain, except among some of the Evangelicals in the Church of England and some of the Baptists. And few would now rank it as a burning question.

* Universalism (III.), Ritschl dismissed as 'sentimental.' His own inclination was towards a doctrine of conditional immortality, but he left his eschatology somewhat in the dark.

The controversy has gone to sleep. Or judgment in the cause goes by default.

LITERATURE—Besides Ritschl and Hastie, referred to above, the attentive reader will find fossil marks of the controversy in some of the hymns of the Evangelical Revival, both Calvinistic and Wesleyan.

III. UNIVERSAL ULTIMATE SALVATION.—1. At the present day, 'Universalism' most naturally suggests to the reader the doctrine of the final restitution of all souls (there are Universalist churches in America in this sense). The doctrine is not, indeed, a novelty. It is found, qualified by his extraordinary insistence upon individual free-will, in Origen's closely-knit speculative system; also in Gregory of Nyssa, and others. And Ritschl (Gesch. des Pietismus) notes, with scorn, among the symptoms of post-Reformation 'pietism,' that, ever and anon, hope is expressed even on behalf of con-demned and lost souls. The most earnest and ardent supporters in Great Britain of the universalist doctrine have been Thomas Erskine of Linlathen (in his later years; d. 1870), Samuel Cox (Salvator Mundi, 1877), and Caleb Scott of Manchester. But Tennyson's In Memoriam (1849) has perhaps done more than any formal theological work to move opinion in this direction; and there has been a great break-up of the old unhesitating belief in literally unending punishment. Some have taught conditional immortality (E. White, Life in Christ, 1875; Petavel [French-Swiss], The Parkley of Immortality and 1890. Life in Christ, 18'15; Petavel [French-Swiss], The Problem of Immortality, 2 vols. 1890-91 (Eng. tr. in one vol. 1892); W. D. Maclaren, others a mitigated punishment (F. W. Farrar, Eternal Hope, 1878, Mercy and Judgment, 1881; hinted also in J. R. Illingworth's Reason and Revelation, 1902, ch. xii.). Others plead for uncertainty (E. H. Plumptre, Spirits in Prison, 1884, with full and interesting references; Plumptre's brother-in-law, F. D. Maurice (Theological Essays, 1853), had stated philosophic doubts as to the meaning of 'eternal.' philosophic doubts as to the meaning of 'eternal.' Present writer's Essays Towards a New Theology, 1889). An original and very curious suggestion is found in A. M. Fairbairn's Christ in Modern Theology, 1893, p. 467. Deity 'cannot annihilate, but the sentence of condemnation is indeterminate rather than eternal (like sentences of committal to Elmira reformatory prison, N.Y.). Repentance always remains possible. If or when the damned repent, they shall emerge. Besides all these changes or innovations in belief, the growing reticence, and one may say reluctance, among those who maintain full traditional orthodoxy is even more significant. Few would now write as Charles Reade did (1856) in his brilliant novel, Never Too Late to Mend (ch. 21), as if the last moments of life on this side the veil were necessarily the last moments of hope for the soul ('Never' too late?).

2. Much of what we have just mentioned concerns us only in so far as it represents a great swaying of opinion towards universalism (in the fullest sense). The three senses of the word which we have been studying form a climax—Christ for all races, Christ for all souls, Christ actually redeeming and winning all. In the theological discussion just noted—Fairbairn is an exception—the question is generally argued as one of NT interpretation. The present writer does not think that hopeful. He sees no ground for challenging the old doctrine on exegetical lines. Words often applied to the universalist hope—Apokatastasis, 'restitution of all things,' Ac 3<sup>21</sup> (cf. Mt 17<sup>11</sup> ||, Ac 1<sup>6</sup>)—do not really bear the meaning supposed. One passage teaches probation after death (1 P 3<sup>19</sup>), but it hardly falls within the limits of this article. Eternal punishment had come to be the doctrine of the synagogue, and it passed into the NT with perhaps even sharper definition, as a witness to the unspeakable evil of sin. True, the doctrine was not rigorously formulated, and it is a question among interpreters whether St. Paul's teaching is eternal punishment or rather a certain type of conditional-immortality doctrine. But generally the NT is clear, even the language used by Christ; although we note that what is freshest and most personal in our Lord's words (Lk 12<sup>47,48</sup>) goes to modify the dreadful wholesale dogma, and fore-shadows, at however remote a time, the ultimate challenging of the letter of this article of the theological creed. Again, as a matter of exegesis, we cannot claim either the Johannine teaching of our Lord (Jn 12<sup>32</sup>), or the culminating point in St. Paul's great argument (Ro 11<sup>32</sup>), as asserting universal salvation. Other plainer passages are decisive. There is a 'son of perdition' (Jn 17<sup>12</sup>), and St. Paul denounces 'eternal destruction' on sinners (2 Th 1<sup>9</sup>). Still, the question recurs here, too, whether the spirit and inner drift of such words—words spoken on the mountain-tops of spiritual vision—can be satisfied by anything less than their full meaning.

3. Recent change in theological opinion is largely a matter of moral recoil. We may sum up the moral postulate by saying that, as long as there is hope of rescuing the soul, any severity is a holy and even—though one trembles at the words—a gracious thing. But if character sets permanently in the ways of evil, can we credit long-drawn-out suffering? Our generation, from a sense of duty, puts even the cruellest of murderers to a painless death. We, who dare not torture, cannot conceive that God's administration includes endless torment.

4. Passing from simpler moral considerations to a religious speculation, we note that optimism enters into every theistic creed. In some sense—in the deepest sense—what happens in God's world is the best. It is best that evil should be permitted, should show what is in itself, should be conquered. Above all, when God's providence and grace have reached their goal in history, we must be able to say, 'It is best.' Again, God is omnipotent. He cannot, of course, do anything formally impossible or inherently absurd; nor can He 'deny Himself.' But any lawful desire of His children He can and will supply. All that He has is ours, for we are 'heirs of God.' He acts in His own way, according to His own will; yet He grants what we desire, or something better. This is the key which unlocks the riddles of our private lives. Its grandest and most public application is found in redemption. God could not, or would not, ignore the world's sin. He did what was far better, when He sent Jesus Christ. Now, here it seems incomparably the divinest issue of history that redemption should prove universal, and God all in all, not through slaughter of His enemies ('Order reigns in Warsaw'), still less through chaining them in hopeless misery and hatred, but through winning in every heart that victory which, in some of the hardest and darkest of hearts, Christ has won already.

'His blood can make the foulest clean; His blood availed for me.'

Again, God is our Father. Men have said in the writer's hearing,—some lightly, some with the profoundest gravity and tenderness,—'I could leave no child of mine to endless misery. Can God do that?' We, being evil, cannot but raise this question. Our Maker must answer it.

tion. Our Maker must answer it.

5. On the other hand, we cannot banish from our minds the tendency of character to set, for good or for evil. As we know it, this tendency remains incomplete. None are perfect, nor may we regard any as beyond rescue. But even a child learns how repetition facilitates either evil or good, and how a delayed reform grows harder and less likely to be achieved. It is no skirmish or sham fight for which we are enlisted. As right differs from wrong by the whole diameter of being, so the issues of the life that has been won for righteousness and love must differ from those of the life that has willingly preferred sin. Measured and limited ill-consequence is in no sort of proportion to the infinite evil of wilful wickedness; and the rhetoric of universalism in the minds of those who 'eddy round and round' is the lazy and lying assurance, 'It will come to the same thing in the end.' God cannot brook this. He must needs threaten sin with its wages; and we have no right to affirm that the most awful of all threats is but an empty or ideal possibility. So, longing with full hearts for a universal restitution of lost souls, we must leave this theme of mystery and terror upon the steps of the Redeemer's throne of grace.

UNLEAVENED BREAD.—See PASSOVER.

UNPARDONABLE SIN.—The expression is not a Scriptural one, but rests partly upon a saying of Jesus reported in different forms by all the Synoptists, and partly upon two analogous passages in Hebrews and one in 1 John. It is only with the saying in the Gospels that we are directly concerned, but the passages in the Epistles must be glanced at as bearing upon our interpretation of Christ's words, and something must be said also as to the place of the subject in Christian experience.

1. In the Gospels.—It is the solemn declaration of Jesus that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit shall never be forgiven which forms our fundamental authority. In an examination of these words, several points have to be considered. (1) The occasion of the utterance.—Both Mt. and Mk. connect the saying with calumnious charges of the scribes and Pharisees, based upon our Lord's action in curing demoniacs (Mt 12<sup>22n</sup>, Mk 3<sup>11, 22n</sup>.) I.k. gives it a different setting (12<sup>2n</sup>, et .l1<sup>14n</sup>.); but while it is possible that Jesus used the words on separate occasions, there can be little question that, if He spoke them only once, it is from Mt. and Mk. that we get the proper historical connexions. His work in delivering demoniacs from the power of evil spirits had deeply impressed the multitude, who, according to Mt. (12<sup>23</sup>), began to ask, 'Is this the Son of David?' But when the Pharisees heard it, they said, 'This man doth not cast out devils but by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils' (v.<sup>24</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup>; cf. Lk 11<sup>15</sup>). Jesus showed the absurdity of such a charge, considered from the point of view of mere reason and common sense (Mt 12<sup>25n</sup>, Mk 3<sup>25n</sup>, Lk 11<sup>17n</sup>.). And then, suddenly changing His tone as He passed from the logical weakness of His adversaries to lay His finger on their moral and spiritual fault, He uttered those memorable words in which He declared that while all other sins and blasphemies, even blasphemy against Himself, shall be forgiven, whosoever shall blaspheme against the Holy Spirit shall never be forgiven (Mt 12<sup>231, 22</sup>, Mk 3<sup>25, 25</sup>; cf. Lk 12<sup>10</sup>).

(2) The nature of the sin.—In seeking for this,

(2) The nature of the sin.—In seeking for this, the occasion of the utterance serves as a guide. A study of the context in Mt. and Mk. at once disposes of some of the views that have been entertained as to the nature of the sin against the Holy Spirit—all those, e.g., that are associated with the idea that only Christians can be guilty of it. Jesus was speaking to Pharisees, and it is by thinking, in the first place, of the Pharisees and their attitude to Him and His teaching that we get on the right line for arriving at the meaning of His words. He had cast out demons; and the

Pharisees said that He did this by the help of Beelzebub. He had delivered men and women from unclean spirits (Mk 1<sup>287</sup>, Mt 10<sup>1</sup>, Lk 4<sup>287</sup>, and passim); and they said of Himself, 'He hath an unclean spirit' (Mk 3<sup>20</sup>). Now, such language regarding Jesus strikes us, first of all, as blasphemy against the Son of Man Himself—and this it undoubtedly was. But this was not the aspect of the sin upon which Jesus fastened. On the contrary, He declared that all blasphemy against the Son of Man shall be forgiven. It was possible for men to insult Him personally, through want of thought or ignorance as to His real character. Of all such offenders He was ready to say, as He said at last of those who nailed Him to the cross or reviled Him hanging there, 'Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do' (Lk 23<sup>24</sup>). But apart from all questions of His personal dignity, Jesus came revealing in His words and deeds the Divine spirit of holiness and love. The works He did testified to the manner of spirit He was of. But in the presence of the Divine goodness that shone from His beneficent activities, the Pharisees only gnashed their teeth and declared that the spirit of Jesus was the spirit of Satan. This was spirit of Jesus was the spirit of Satan. blasphemy, not against Jesus only, but against the Divine Spirit that was manifested in Him. And such blasphemy, we must remember, the Pharisees were guilty of, not once, but constantly. Jesus might have affirmed of them, as Stephen afterwards affirmed in the face of the Sanhedrin, 'Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost' (Ac 7<sup>51</sup>). John the Baptist had come 'in the way of righteousness' (Mt 21<sup>22</sup>); and they said of him, 'He hath a devil' (Mt 11<sup>18</sup>, Lk 7<sup>23</sup>). Jesus came in the way, not only of righteousness, but of love; and of this incarnation of the Divine grace they said again and again, 'He hath a devil' (Mt 9<sup>34</sup> 12<sup>34</sup>, Mk 3<sup>22</sup>, Lk 11<sup>15</sup>, Jn 7<sup>20</sup> 8<sup>43</sup> . <sup>52</sup> 10<sup>20</sup>). They said this, moreover, not rashly or carelessly, but deliberately and malignantly; not because they were blind to the tokens of God's presence with Jesus, but because they hated Him for having crossed them in their paths of selfishness and pride, and revealed both to themselves and others the utter emptiness of their religious life. Their blasphemy thus was not the hasty utterance of a moment, but a vice of their indwelling thoughts and character (Mt 1229); not a single act, but a habitual attitude. The light that came into the world shone round about them; but they loved the darkness rather than the light, because their deeds were evil. And at last they came not only to prefer the darkness, but to hate the light so bitterly that nothing would serve them but to declare to others and try to persuade them-selves that it came not from God, but from the

(3) Its unpardonable character.—The unpardonableness of such blasphemy as this, Jesus affirms in language that can hardly be mistaken. In Lk. once (12<sup>10</sup>) and in Mt. twice (12<sup>21, 22</sup>) He declares, 'It shall not be forgiven'—adding in Mt. (ν.<sup>23</sup>) the ominous words, 'neither in this age (alών), nor in that which is to come.' The attempt is sometimes made to soften down the force of the last expression. The present age, it is said, was simply the Mosaic age or dispensation under which the Jews were living; while 'the age to come' was the Messianic age or Christian dispensation. Our Lord's words thus mean only that, whether men live under the Law or the Gospel, blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is unpardonable. They have no reference to the future life; they tell us nothing about a state of doom after death; they do not carry us on to any final issues (so Cox, Expositor, II. iii. [1882] 322). But while it is true that the Jews of our Lord's time used the phrases 'this age' and 'the coming age' to denote the period before and the period after the advent of the expected Messiah (cf., however, Schürer, HJP II. ii. 177), it is clear from the Gospels that Jesus Himself habitually employed them to indicate the age before and the age after His own Parousia (see Mt 13. ω. ω. 24. 28. Mk 10. Lk 18. 20. 3. thereby throwing 'the age to come' into that future world which lies beyond His Second Advent and the resurrection of the dead (see Salmond, Chr. Doct. of Immort. 381). And if Mt.'s language left us in any doubt as to the absoluteness of His meaning, the doubt would disappear when we turn to Mk. For there we find Him saying of the man who blasphemes against the Holy Spirit that he 'hath never forgiveness, but is guilty of an eternal sin' (3. RV). Even if it stood by itself, 'hath never forgiveness' would carry a sound of finality with it. And when there is added, Δλλ ενοχός έστιν αλωνίου ἀμαρτήματος, it seems hardly possible to escape from the conclusion that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is here described as a sin for which there is no remedy. The words in the original are exceedingly striking. Ενοχος (= ἐνεχόμενος, fr. ἐν and ἐχω) means 'held in the grip of '(see Morison, Matthew, in loc.). And if we give to αλώνος the meaning it regularly has on the lips of Jesus, 'an eternal sin' appears to mean a sin that eternally persists, a sin that has so engrained itself in the character as to become fixed in the form of destiny. See, further, ETERNAL SIN.

(4) The reason for its unpardonableness.—This does not lie in any limitation of the grace of Christ or of the forgiving mercy of God. It lies in the very nature of the sin as just described. The sin is unpardonable because the sinner has no desire for pardon; it 'hath never forgiveness' because it is not repented of. For when men for selfish reasons hate the light, and persistently shut their eyes against it and blaspheme it, they gradually put their eyes out. God's 'sov'reign vital lamp' still shines about them, but they can no more see it, since they have extinguished their own power of seeing. Eternal darkness is the necessary consequence of eternal sin. It is quite true that Δμάρτημα generally stands for an act, not a state. But from the point of view of exegesis, little can be built upon this. For an act may be the revelation of a state; and when the Pharisees said of Jesus, 'He hath an unclean spirit,' this particular piece of blasphemy, as we have seen, was really the expression of a settled attitude of mind.

2. In the Epistles.—There are two passages in Hebrews that bear upon the subject. In 64-8 the writer describes the impossibility of a renewal unto repentance for Christians who have fallen away from Christ after having once 'tasted of the heavenly gift' and become 'partakers of the Holy Ghost.' In 10<sup>26-21</sup> he declares that there is no more sacrifice for sins in the case of those who sin wilfully and persistently after they have received the knowledge of the truth. It is impossible to suppose that he means that a Christian cannot be forgiven if he falls into sin, however grievous, or that Jesus is unable to save men to the uttermost (cf. 21<sup>146</sup> 10<sup>196</sup>). In the second passage certainly, and presumably in the first also, he is speaking of a deliberate repudiation of Christ on the part of those who have tasted His blessings. Once they were enlightened, but they too loved the darkness rather than the light, and so shut the light out of their hearts, and trampled under foot the Son of God, and did despite unto the Spirit of grace. Thus we have here again, though now in the case, not of Pharisees, but of members of the Christian Church, a manifestation of the same kind of sin as before.* In 1 Jn 5<sup>16</sup> the writer distinguishes between 'a sin unto death' and 'a sin that is not unto death'; and while urging Christians to pray for one another with respect to the latter, says that he does not bid them make request to God concerning the former. It seems evident that there is a reference here to our Lord's language in Mt 1281f. ||, but in itself the passage adds nothing to our knowledge of unpardonable sin.

3. In Christian experience.—The subject is of importance, not only exegetically and theologically, but because of its practical bearings, and that in two different directions. (1) Bunyan at a certain period of his religious history (see Grace Abounding, §§ 96-230) is a type of multitudes who have suffered agonies of spiritual torture through the fear that they have committed a sin for which there is no forgiveness. But if the view taken above is the right one, there is no specific act of blasphemy in word or deed, standing by itself, that we are entitled to think of as 'the unpardonable sin.' The phrase, in fact, is as erroneous as it is unscriptural, though the common use of it has helped to load thousands of sensitive souls with a burden of intolerable pain. There is no mysterious transgression which is sufficient of itself to put a man beyond the power of repentance, and so outside the pale of forgiveness. Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit may find expression and come to its culmination in some specific way; but essentially it is a settled attitude of mind and heart. It is a deliberate extinguishing of that inner light which God Himself has kindled within us, and which ought to respond to His clear shining from without. Such compunctions as Bunyan had are the very best proof that a man has not committed any unpardonable sin, for they are the experiences of one who, though he has not yet realized the all-sufficiency of Christ's grace, is possessed at least of that contrite spirit which trembles at God's word, and so may rest upon the prophet's assurance that unto him the Lord will look (Is 66°). 'Sell Him! unto him the Lord will look (Is 66*). 'Sell Him! sell Him!' was the urgent persuasion of the Tempter in Bunyan's ear. But though at last in his distraction he felt the thought, 'Let Him go if He will,' pass through his mind, the true intention of his heart was always, 'No, no! not for thousands, thousands, thousands!' (op. cit. § 139).

(2) But if anxious and fearful souls need to be reminded that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is not some mysterious sin into which a man may fall against all the promptings of his better nature, the case of the Pharisees and Jesus conveys to all a message of serious warning. No one can stumble suddenly into irremediable sin; but men may drift into it after the fashion of the Pharisees. Selfishness and pride, and not least religious selfishness and pride, may slowly harden the heart and sear the conscience and seal the eyes, until men come to call good evil and light darkness, and are ready at last to say, even of one who manifests the Spirit of God and of Christ, 'He hath a devil.' The special monition of the incident in the Gospels is against that loss of vision which comes from the hardening power of sin, that continual resistance of the Spirit which leads at last to hatred of the Spirit. Poor Francis Spiera, whose case seemed to Bunyan so like his own (op. cit. § 163), may not himself have been guilty of unpardonable sin (cf. Martensen, Chr. Eth. ii. 128); but there is deep significance for all in his solemn sentence, 'Man knows the beginning of sin, but who bounds the issues thereof?' See, further, artt. BLASPHEMY, See, further, artt. In the NT dνάγαιον (TR ἀνώγεον) occurs only in Mk 14<sup>15</sup>, Lk 22<sup>13</sup>, ὑπερώου occurs only in Ac 1<sup>13</sup> 9<sup>27, 39</sup> 20<sup>8</sup>, both words in the sense of upper room. The best MSS of Vulg. have cenaculum for both words in all places. Of other Lat. MSS (besides differences of spelling,—caen., coen., cin., cenn.), in Mk 14<sup>18</sup> k has sub 'pedaneum' sterranæum (having apparently first written subpedaneum, and then tried to alter it to sterranoum), q has locum stratum,  $f_2$  has stratum; in Lk  $22^{12}$  a has modianum, b has pede plano locum, d has superiorem domum, q has superiorem locum, cefizir have in superioribus locum, l has in superioribus; in Acts 1<sup>13</sup> degig MSS used by St. Augustine (Adv. Fel. Man. i. 4; De unit. eccl. 27) have superiora, Grec θ p² tepl have cum introissent in cenaculum ascenderunt in superiora (combining cenaculum with superiora: see Wordsworth and White's note on Ac 1<sup>13</sup> in their edition of Vulg.); in Ac 9<sup>37</sup> m has superioric canaculo, p has superioribus; in 9<sup>38</sup> m has superiora cænaculi, e p have superioribus; in 208 d has superioribus.

2. Events in the upper room.—(1) The Last Supper (wh. see): Mk 14<sup>17</sup>, Mt 26<sup>20</sup>, Lk 22<sup>14</sup>; (2) the washing of the Apostles' feet and subsequent discourse: Jn 13<sup>2-20</sup>; (3) the prophecy of the betrayal of our Lord by Judas: Mk 14<sup>18-21</sup>, Mt 26<sup>21-23</sup>, Lk 22<sup>21-23</sup>, Jn 13<sup>21-23</sup>; (4) the Institution of the Eucharist: 1 Co 11<sup>20-25</sup>, Mk 14<sup>20-25</sup>, Mt 26<sup>26-29</sup>. Lk 2219. 20 (see LORD'S SUPPER); (5) the prophecy of the denial of our Lord by St. Peter and sub-sequent discourse: Lk 22<sup>31-38</sup>, Jn 13<sup>36-38</sup>; cf. Mk 14<sup>27-31</sup>, Mt 26<sup>31-35</sup>, where such a prophecy—either that here recorded or a repetition of it—is placed after the departure from the upper room; (6) discourse: Jn 14; (7) the departure from the upper room: Mk 14<sup>26</sup>, Mt 26<sup>20</sup>, Lk 22<sup>26</sup>, Jn 14<sup>21</sup>. It is possible that the room in an unspecified house in Jerusalem where the disciples met after the Resurrection (Mk 1614, Lk 2433.36, Jn 2019.26), and 'the upper chamber (ὑπερφον) where they were abiding' after the Ascension (Ac 113), were the same as the 'upper room' (drayacor) in which the above events took place; and that this, again, was in 'the house of Mary the mother of John whose surname was Mark' (Ac 1212). 'The combinations are quite legitimate, and only give unity and tions are quite legitimate, and only give unity and compactness to the history, if we suppose that the house of Mary and her son was the one cantral meeting-place of the Church of Jerusalem throughout the Apostolic age' (Sanday, Sacred Sites, p. 83). At the same time, there is no positive evidence in the NT for identifying the dedyator of Mk 14<sup>18</sup>, Lk 22<sup>12</sup> with the brepgior of Ac 1<sup>13</sup>, or for placing it in the house of Mary the mother of John.

3. Places at table in the upper room.—There is some probability in the suggestion (Edersheim, LT ii. 494-95) that our Lord occupied the place of the host, that St. John was on His right hand, Judas in the place of honour on His left hand, and St. Peter in the least honourable place opposite St. John, as shown in the accompanying diagram.

Such an arrangement would account for (1) our Lord telling St. John by what sign to know the traitor without the rest hearing, Jn 13<sup>20</sup>; (2) the giving of the 'sop' first to Judas, Jn 13<sup>20</sup>, Mk 14<sup>20</sup>, Mt 26<sup>20</sup>; (3) the inquiry of Judas whether he was the traitor, and our Lord's reply without the rest hearing the latter, Mt 26<sup>20</sup>, Jn 13<sup>27-20</sup>; (4) the beckening of St. Peter to St. John, and St. Peter's request that St. John should ask our Lord who was the traitor, Jn 13<sup>20</sup>; (5) the possibility that in the 'contention' among the Apostles (Lk 22<sup>20</sup>), if this took place in connexion with the Supper and before it, Judas claimed and obtained the chief place; (6) the possibility that after our Lord's Such an arrangement would account for (1) our chief place; (6) the possibility that after our Lord's rebuke of the 'contention' (Lk 22<sup>25-30</sup>), St. Peter eagerly seized on the lowest place.

4. The identification of the site.—It is thought by many good judges that the traditional site of the cenaculum (the present building dates from the 14th cent.) is probably the place where the upper room stood. Dr. Sanday (p. 77) writes, 'I believe that of all the most sacred sites it is the one that has the attenuant aridance in its favour. Indeed has the strongest evidence in its favour. Indeed, the evidence for it appears to me so strong that, for my own part, I think that I should be prepared.

Here Christ came down from heaven. Here the Holy Ghost came down from heaven. And truly it is most fitting that, as we speak of Christ and Golgotha here in Golgotha, so also we should speak of the Holy Ghost in the upper church. But, since He who came down there shares in the glory of Him who was crucifed here, we speak here of Him who came down there, for the worship of Them is indivinible.'

YAIN.-1. 'In vain': Mk 77 (|| Mt 159) μάτην δέ σέβονταί με διδάσκοντες διδασκαλίας έντάλματα άνθρώπων. This is the only place in NT where the adverb Inis is the only place in N1 where the advert ματην is found (orig. accus. from ματη, 'a folly'). The Vulg. has in vanum in Mk., sine causa (= 'without reason,' Cic.) in Mt. Both senses are perhaps included: their worship was 'meaningless' and 'to no purpose' (cf. Ja 1<sup>26</sup> ματαιος θρησκεία, with Mayor's [Com. on James, 71] apt quotation from Isocrates, ad Nicoclen 18 E, γγού (δίνας σούνους σουν και) decorated westerns and the θυμα τουτο κάλλιστον είναι και θεραπείαν μεγίστην έαν ως βέλτιστον και δικαιότατον σαυτόν παρέχης).—Our Lord quotes here from Is 2913, where LXX reads μάτην δὲ σέβονται με διδάσκοντες έντάλματα ἀνθρώπων και διδασκαλίας. The clause in the Heb. text may be literally made and their for the clause in the Heb. be literally rendered, 'And their fearing me is become ('יִשְּהִי) a statute of men which they have learned.' How to account for μάτην in the Gr. text is a question still unsolved. Grotius (Opera, ed. Amsterdam, 1679, ii. 155) thought it evident that the LXX read  $\min$  (= $\mu d \tau_1 n_{\nu}$ , cf. Is 494) and not that the Heb. text, so that the clause would then have meant, 'And their fearing me is vain—a statute of men which they have learned!' This brilliant emendation of the text is adopted by Turpie (OT in the New (1868), 196) and Nestle (Expos. Times, xi. 330). It is quite possible that our Lord 'read יהיה in His Hebrew scroll of Isaiah,' and that this was the received reading at the time that the Gospels were written. Such a solution of the difficulty would indeed be completely satisfying, but we must remember that the proposed reading is merely a conjectural one, and that no external evidence in its favour has been found. Other suggested explanations of the μάτην in the Gospels are, that our Lord used the LXX and quoted from it, or that in reporting His answer to the Pharisees the writer or writers quoted memoriter from the LXX (it will be observed that the order of the last words is not the same in the LXX and in the Gospels). The latter explanation is the one generally preferred by expositors, some of whom assign reasons still more unsatisfying for the presence of μάτην. But seeing that it cannot be proved that our Lord did not use an Aramaic word corresponding to μάτην in quoting the passage from Isaiah, we feel it best to accept the μάτην as stamped with His authority.—Our Lord by this citation authenticates and carries forward the teaching of the prophets of the OT as to the vanity of that worship which merely conformed to human traditions, and by which it was thought possible to gain the favour of God without moral obedience (cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC 293-295; Driver, Is. 57; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 282).

2. 'To use vain repetitions': Mt 67 προσευχόμενοι (cf. Mt. Company)

δὲ μὴ βαττολογήσητε ὥσπερ οἱ ἐθνικοί. Mrs. A. S. Lewis (Expos. Times, xii. 60) approves of the derivation of βαττολογέω from the Arabic b'ṭal, 'vain,' 'useless,' recently suggested by Blass. 'It is one of those hybrid compounds which come into existence in countries where two or more languages are But it is more probable that the word is onomatopoetic (like  $\beta a \tau \tau a \rho l \zeta \omega$ , see Stephanus, Thesaurus, s.v.), and is derived from the sound made by the repetition of the same syllable in The statutes, w.e.), and is derived from the sound made by the repetition of the same syllable in stammering or stuttering. Our Lord gives the interpretation of the word in the clause following, 'For they think that they shall be heard for their πολυλογία' (cf. Meyer, Holtzmann, in loc.). What 'second veil' (He 9³) which divided the στις or Holy of Holies. This reluctant and ungracious Deity is to be worked upon by our saying the same thing over and over again (cf. 1 K 18<sup>26</sup>), or by repeating His honours and titles (cf. Ac 19<sup>34</sup>). In the words  $\varpi\sigma\pi\epsilon\rho$  of and titles (cf. Ac 197). In the words  $\omega \sigma w \in \rho$  at  $\ell \theta r u c \ell$  the calls up a picture of those whom His hearers have no desire to resemble (Expositor, 1900 (i.), 239). 'Pestering the gods with entreaties,' dinning into the ears of the gods,' were Roman phrases: thus Tacitus speaks of Galba 'wearying with artspaties the gods of an empire no longer his.' with entreaties the gods of an empire no longer his (Hist. i. 29); cf. Statius, Thebais, 2. 224, 'Superos in vota fatigant Inachidæ'; Ter. Heaut. v. 1. 6, 'Desiste, inquam, deos obtundere.' Such expressions set forth the contrast between Jesus' teaching of the Divine Fatherhood and the low conceptions about God on which the prayers of the heathen were founded, and give point to the precept. Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him' (Mt 68)

That our Lord's prohibition of βαττολογία is not meant to exclude such prolonged and repeated prayers as are genuine utterances of love and desire, the impassioned pressing-in of the devout spirit into communion with God, is evident from His enjoining increasing earnestness (Mt 7<sup>7-11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>9-18</sup>) and persevering importunity (Lk 11<sup>86</sup>, 18<sup>16</sup>.) in prayer, as well as from His own example, when He sought relief from the weight and pressure of His work and 'continued all night in prayer to God' (6<sup>12</sup>), or when He 'offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto him that was able to save him from death' (He 5'), satisfying the fervour of His feeling of Sonship with the cry, 'Abba, Father,' and returning to His same prayer as before (Mk 14<sup>20</sup> (Mt 26<sup>24</sup>) τον αὐτον λόγον εἰπών, 'the same petition,' rather than 'the same words'; cf. Swete, 327). Our Lord's prayers were the beginning of His ever-continuing intercession (Ro 8<sup>34</sup>, He 7<sup>25</sup>), and in the one instance reported of a prayer of considerable length which He offered as His disciples stood around Him He offered as His disciples stood around Him (Jn 17) there is a repetition of the same expressions. With respect to the perfect form of words which He taught us in the Lord's Prayer (wh. see), it is by our repeating it often that we come to understand its real depth, and how all our requests are to be brought under one or other of its petitions; and when we have not said it well, we should try to say it better a second or a third time. sense of our Lord's saying is set forth in one of Bp. Wilson's 'Maxims of Piety': 'The eloquence of prayer consists in our proposing our wants to God in a plain manner' (Maxims, 132), and still better by Hooker in the words, 'The thing which God doth regard is how virtuous our minds are, and not how copious our tongues in prayer; how well we think, and not how long we talk, when we come to present our supplications before Him' (Eccles. Pol. v. 32. 1); cf. Augustine's letter to Proba, quoted by Trench (Scr. on the Mount, 255).

is the only reference to the veil of the Temple in the NT, that in Hebrews being to the veil of the Tabernacle. The Greek words are το καταπέτασμα τοῦ ναοῦ. In the LXX ναός = τςτ in Ps 28 (27)² and κατ. =(1) τρς, the curtain before the door of the Holy Place and before the gate of the fore-court in the Tabernacle; and (2) אָדָים, the curtain between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (similarly Philo, Vita Moysis, iii. 5). The Gospel according to the Hebrews, as quoted by Jerome, had in the above passage 'lintel' instead of 'veil' ('superliminare templi infinite magnitudine fractum esse atque divisum'). It is asserted that in the Temple of Solomon there was no veil, since it is mentioned only in 2 Ch 3<sup>14</sup>; but Thenius' emendation of 1 K 6<sup>21</sup> 'drew the veil across with golden chains' is good. In the Mishna the veil of the sanctuary is presupposed, e.g. in Yoma v. 1, where the mention of the ark shows that the writer is thinking of the Temple of Solomon. Josephus (BJ v. v. 4) mentions a gorgeously embroidered veil before the yon, and a second veil, which he does not describe, in front of the דָּבֶּי of the Temple as he knew it.

A difficulty is occasioned by the fact that there appear to have been in Herod's Temple not one but two veils between the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies, each representing a surface of the wall one cubit thick, which in Solomon's Temple separated the two places. In Yoma v. 1 the high priest on the Day of Atonement leaves the Holy Place by the south end of the outer veil, walks northwards down the cubit space between the two veils, and enters the sanctuary by the north end of the inner veil. This cubit space is in Middoth iv. 7 called prope, that is, repair, because in the first Temple it was filled with the wall, and the builders of the second did not know whether to reckon the space as belonging to the Holy Place or to the Holy of Holies. According to another account, there was only a single veil. In any case the veil would mean the outer one, which alone was visible to any except the priests. The Kaabah in Mecca has also a veil over its door.

The rending of the veil of the Temple would indicate the end of its sanctity, just as the tearing of a woman's veil means dishonouring her (Hamasa, Freytag, i. 141).

It is a curious fact that Jewish tradition also records the occurrence of certain prodigies about this time. Josephus (BJ VI. v. 3) enumerates several portents which pressged the destruction of the Temple: a sword appeared suspended over the city, a heifer about to be sacrificed brought forth a lamb, and the brazen gate opened of its own accord. Lightfoot (Prospect of the Temple, xx. 1 [Pitman's ed. ix. 329]) says: 'There are three remarkable things, which the Jews do date from forty years before the destruction of the Temple—namely this of the Temple-doors' opening of themselves, and the Sanhedrin's flitting from the room Gazith, and the scarlet list on the scapegoat's head not turning white.' Compare Plutarch's account of the prodigies which foreshadowed the murder of Cæsar.

In He 1020 the veil of the Tabernacle is inter-In the 10th the veil of the laberhacie is interpreted as symbolizing the corporeal nature of Christ, and in later mysticism phenomenal existence is termed 'the veil.' In 2 Co 3<sup>125</sup>, the veil (κάλυμμα) which Moses put on (Ex 3<sup>425</sup> τρφ, LXX κάλυμμα) becomes the spiritual blindness of the Jewish nation, probably without any reference to Is 25<sup>7</sup>, where the words are different. The veil on Israel's heart is 'done away in Christ' (& Χριστφ καταργείται).

YENGEANCE.—The word 'vengeance' (ἐκδίκησις) occurs in EV of the Gospels only in Lk 2122, where it refers to God's providential punishment of sin. έκδικησις occurs also in the phrase ποιεῖν ἐκδικησις (EV 'avenge') in the parable of the Unjust Judge (Lk 18.7.8), and the corresponding verb ἐκδικέω (also rendered 'avenge'; cf. RVm 'do me justice of') is found in the same parable (vv.3.5). Outside the Gospels these words and the cognate ἐκδικος occur exactly a dozen times. Some of the passages exactly a dozen times. Some of the passages will call for reference in the course of this article. We are not left, however, to the very rare use of this small group of words for our Lord's teaching on vengeance. We gather it from several passages of direct instruction, from His continual insistence on an unrevengeful, a forgiving, loving spirit, and from His own conduct throughout His ministry, but especially at its close.

Our word 'vengeance' is closely related to two others,—'avenge' and 'revenge,'—between which, at least in modern usage, an important distinction is made. Both have to do with the redress of wrong. In 'avenge' the idea of the justice of the redress or punishment is prominent. In 'revenge,' on the other hand, the predominant thought is that of the infliction of punishment or pain, not necessarily unjust, for the gratification of resentful or malicious feelings (note, e.g., in Jer 15<sup>18</sup> the substitution in RV of 'avenge' for AV 'revenge,' and on the other hand the retention of 'avenge' in Ro 12<sup>19</sup>). 'Vengeance' leans, now to the one, now to the other of these meanings. It may be just, it may be malicious; even when it is just, the motive may be wrong.

1. The aim of Christ was to create in His disciples a new attitude towards those who had wronged them. Evidently He was preparing them, at least in part, for injuries that must come to them as His followers (Mt 5105.); but His teaching has, of course, a much wider application. permission, even encouragement, of retaliation by the OT, and still more the interpretations, exaggerations, limitations of the scribes and Pharisees, Christ swept away with an authority which astounded His hearers. He denounced the attitude of retaliation and hatred, and commanded His disciples to accept the sufferings which fell to their lot. But this was more than a demand for a new attitude. It was the exorcizing of an evil spirit, and the opening of the doors of the heart to a new spirit. An attitude may be merely external and mechanical. Christ wants more. The nega-tive must have a corresponding positive or be morally worthless. Forgiveness and benevolence morally worthless. Forgiveness and benevolence must take the place of vengeance; love, not hatred, must be the motive of thought and act. 'Enemy' must be blotted out of the vocabulary of the follower of Christ, at least as a category in which any of his fellow-men may be included. Others may hate and persecute him, he must love and pray for them, and do them good. It is this new spirit that is the supreme moral difficulty; it is here that all questions of interpretation and application must find their solution. We must remember, not only Christ's 'resist not,' but also His 'pray for,' and His 'love.'

This teaching of Christ is found constantly throughout the Gospels. He pronounced 'blessed' the meek, the merciful, the peacemakers, the persecuted (Mt 5<sup>5, 7, 9, 10th</sup>). He rebuked James and John when they would have called down fire from heaven on the Samaritan village that would not receive Him (Lk 9<sup>818</sup>.). He taught His disciples to forgive a sinning but penitent brother, not with a niggard, but with a generous and inexhaustible forgiveness (Lk 17<sup>3t</sup>, cf. Mt 18<sup>21t</sup>.). He even makes God's forgiveness of a man depend on the man's forgiveness of his fellow (Mt 6<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>35</sup>, Mk 11261.) He taught His disciples to pray that they might be forgiven as they forgave others (Mt 613, Lk 114). He warned the Twelve, as He sent them out on their mission (Mt 10), that they would suffer hatred, persecution, even death, for His sake; and charged them to be, in the midst of wolves, 'wise as serpents and harmless as doves' (v.16), in the endurance of their sufferings to have no fear, but to rely on God.

2. His own conduct during His ministry is the best commentary on His teaching. It is true that there is much denunciation of evil (e.g. Mt 23),

VERILY 792 VENGEANCE

that He upbraided for their unbelief the cities where He had wrought His great miracles (Mt 11<sup>20</sup>T. ||), that He swept the Temple clear of those who had robbed it of its sanctity (Jn 2<sup>14</sup>T., Mt 21<sup>12</sup>T. ||). But these are echoes of the Divine wrath; they are not in any single instance the expression of personal anger, of retaliation, of hatred. the other hand, we have His patient endurance of all manner of personal abuse, His heart-broken lament over Jerusalem (Mt 23<sup>37</sup>||), His bearing during and after His trial (Mt 26. 27), and above all, His prayer on the cross: 'Father, forgive them: for they know not what they do' (Lk 23<sup>34</sup>).

3. This teaching of Christ, forbidding vengeance, requiring forgiveness and love is built on a firm requiring forgiveness and love, is built on a firm religious basis. His aim as a religious Teacher, as the Sent of God, was to renew the sin-broken fellowship between men and God, to make men sons of God; but the indispensable condition of sonship is unity of nature. The essence of the Divine nature is love, and the highest manifestation of the Divine love is foreignence and because tion of the Divine love is forgiveness and benevo-The spirit of malevolence, of retaliation, of vindictive dealing with men, is alien to the spirit of God. Therefore it must be banned out of the heart of those who would be sons of God, and replaced by the spirit of forgiveness, of ungrudging It is this conception of the essential love of God issuing in forgiveness, in love, that is the basis of the high demands of Christ, and the inspiration and possibility of our response (Mt 5<sup>43-45.48</sup> 18<sup>23-35</sup>, Lk 6<sup>35</sup>. Note, also, how Christ links the Second Commandment to the First as 'like unto it,' Mt 2239||).

4. If the teaching of Christ seem at first sight impracticable, destructive of moral order, and delivering wrong-doers from the fear of punishment, the answer to these objections is not far to seek. In the first place, liberation from the spirit of vengeance is a moral triumph for the sufferer of wrong. Revenge is evil. It belongs at best to a lower stage of morality and of the knowledge of God. It cannot justify itself to those who have seen God in the face of Jesus Christ. The sons of God must be like the Son of God, like God Himself, who loves and forgives without limit. Further love is the most potent moral force that the world has ever known. To meet wrong with revenge may be a satisfaction, and may seem a right thing to the natural man. Vengeance may accomplish its object, may fully punish and even crush the wrong-doer. But it does not conquer him, it does not crush the wrong out of his heart, it does not make him ashamed of his sin, it does not win him to good and to God. Love does—not always indeed, but often—and nothing else can. Love is a heaping of coals of fire on an enemy's head (Ro 1220), the kindling of a burning shame in his heart, the overcoming of evil with good, the triumph of God. See art. RETALIATION.

5. There is a further and a very solemn strain in the teaching of Christ, in which we find the final answer to the fear that moral anarchy may arise from the exorcism of the spirit of vengeance. The clearest expression of it is found outside the Gospels (Ro  $12^{19}$ ): 'Avenge not yourselves, beloved, but give place unto wrath  $[\tau \hat{\eta} \ \delta \rho \gamma \hat{\eta}, the \text{ wrath}$ , the wrath of God]: for it is written, Vengeance belongeth unto me; I will recompense, saith the Lord.' To avenge ourselves is to assume the pre-rogative of God. So Christ teaches, e.g., in the parable of the Unjust Judge: 'Shall not God avenge his own elect?... I say unto you, that he will avenge them speedily' (Lk 1871). It is in this light that we must read all Christ's words of denunciation, His parables of Judgment, His judgial acts (such as the eleganing of the Temple) judicial acts (such as the cleansing of the Temple), His lament over impenitent Jerusalem. 'It shall His lament over impenitent Jerusalem.

be more tolerable . . . in the day of judgment'  $(Mt\ 10^{15}\ ;\ cf.\ 10^{32}\ 11^{206L}\ 12^{36L}\ 16^{3L},\ Jn\ 8^{44}).$  The moral order of the world will be vindicated by Him whose right alone it is to mete out vengeance to evildoers, who alone has adequate knowledge and wisdom to do justice to sin.

It would, of course, be easy to hold this teaching of Christ in a wrong spirit, to cherish a sense of satisfaction that, even if we may not a enge our-selves, yet vengeance is certainly in store for wrong-doers. This would be entirely contrary to the spirit of Christ. It would be the old evil spirit of vengeance in a new form, a more subtle and therefore a worse form. It would mean an utter absence of the love which Christ inculcates, which desires and prays for the good of the enemy. It would be the conquest of ourselves by evil, not of the evil in others by good. But, on the other hand, the moral sense which God has implanted in us, and which He has strengthened by His revelation of Himself, could not rest satisfied unless it were assured that evil shall not go unpunished, that unrepented wrong shall receive its due reward from an all-wise and, let us add, an all-loving God.

YERILY.—A formula of asseveration or corro-

The Hebrew is אָכָן, and, while it is translated in the OT by

The Hebrew is Dr., and, while it is translated in the OT by the LXX into process (cf. Ps 7219) or already (cf. 1er 28(35)8), and by Aquila into structurations, it is simply transliterated by the NT writers, except St. Luke, who, in deference to his Gentile readers, gives already in three instances where the parallels have already (lk 97 = Mt 1628 = Mt 91; lk 1244 = Mt 247; lk 213 = Mt 123. According to R. Judah ben Sima, the formula had three uses: (1) in swearing (cf. Nu 522), (2) in accepting (cf. Dt 2718), and (3) in expressing confidence (cf. 1 K 136). When a Rabbi would add impressiveness to a doctrine, he prefaced it with Amen, 'Verily,' signifying that it was a tradition received by Moses on Simai.† The congregation responded Amen to the prayers in the synagogue, a usage which passed into the Christian ecclesia; 1 and the Talmud warns against 'an orphan Amen,' meaning one uttered without consideration, or in ignorance whereto the response is being made. It is somewhat unfortunate that, where it is an asseverative preface, our versions have translated alare by 'verily,' and, where it is a liturgical response, have simply transliterated it. Let it be understood that the word is the same in both cases. See art. Amen.

Jesus, like the Rabbis, was accustomed, by way of bespeaking His hearers' attention, to preface important declarations with Amen, 'Verily.' All our Evangelists represent Him as doing so; but whereas the Synoptists put on His lips a single 'Verily,' St. John makes Him in every instance reduplicate the formula, saying 'Verily, verily. What is the explanation of this divergence? It is out of the question to suppose that, since the Johannine and the Synoptic logia are in no case identical, Jesus may have spoken after both fashions, employing now the single, now the double 'Verily.' It does not appear that the latter was in use among the Jews, and it may be assumed that Jesus always spoke according to the Synoptic representation. Lightfoot makes a shrewd and far-reaching comment on Mk 541. Talitha, kûm means merely "Maiden, arise!" And this is all that Jesus actually said; 'but in His pronunciation and utterance of these words there flashed forth such authority and commanding energy, that they sounded no less than if He had said: "Maiden, I tell thee, arise." (Cf. Mt 98 with Mk 211 = Lk 524). May not this be the explanation of St. John's reduplicated 'Verily'? Jesus actually used the single formula; but such was the authority of His tone that St. John, reproducing not merely His language but His spirit, reiterated the asseveration, very much as a modern writer might underline the word, or as the Hebrew idiom expressed plurality or magnitude by repetition; e.g. Gn 1416 'full of pits of asphalt,' literally 'pits, pits of asphalt.' The beloved disciple held every tone, look, and gesture of the Master in reverent remembrance; and when he limned His picture, he was in nowise careful to reproduce details with slavish and pedantic accuracy, but, with the artist's instinct, sought to catch those subtle and elusive expressions which reveal the true personality. When he reduplicated 'Verily,' he designed to make his readers realize the majesty wherewith the Lord spoke and the authority which His words carried.*

VICARIOUS SACRIFICE.—The word 'vicarious' (ricarius from vicis, 'change,' 'alteration') means acting, or suffering, for another, or in the place of another. The idea of change, transfer, or substitution pertains to the term. It has the same root as 'vice' in 'vicegerent,' 'viceroy' or 'vicar,' and other words which signify that one person has assumed the place, position, or office of another. It may mean 'instead of' (drrl), or 'in behalf of' (brtp). The word 'sacrifice' (from sacer, 'sacred,' 'holy,' and facere, 'to make') means something devoted, or offered at a cost; and in the stricter religious sense means something consecrated, or offered to a fivinity as an acknowledgment of benefits received, or as a propitiation for favours to be extended. Sacrifice (wh. see) is a somewhat different act in different cults and in different stages of religious development, but has in it the idea of a means of approach to Deity through a material oblation for the purpose of securing His favour. When the service is voluntarily undertaken, or when it is assumed at a cost to the individual and for the sake of another, no personal benefit being expected in return, we have sacrifice which is vicarious. Vicarious sacrifice, therefore, has been appropriately defined as 'voluntarily assuming the place and entering into the condition of some one for his benefit.' The two words, 'vicarious' and 'sacrifice,' add to each other, and together well define a phenomenon which we find occurring in the more advanced religions, and especially in the religion of Christ.

'Vicarious sacrifice' is not a Scripture expression, but is used by theologians to represent the meaning of a large number of passages found in the NT, in which the substitutionary character of Jesus' sufferings are referred to, as, e.g., the one in which Jesus describes the end of His coming as a λότρον ἀντὶ πολλῶν, a ransom for many (Mk 10<sup>48</sup>). These passages have generally been held to teach vicarious sacrifice; but just how the words are to be understood, in what sense the sufferings of Jesus were vicarious, whether we are to consider the terms to mean 'in behalf of,' or 'in the place of,' whether the vicarious sacrifice was made in the interests of God (Satisfaction theories), or of men (Moral and Sympathy theories), or both (Mediation theories)—these questions have constituted some of the most disputed problems of theology, and have been the ground on which have been developed diverse conceptions which for hundreds of years have agitated the Church. As far as the words 'Vicarious sacrifice' are concerned, they can be used in either sense, for Christ's sacrifice would be vicarious if it were made to propitiate the offended dignity of God, or uphold His justice, or maintain His law, or satisfy the demands of His ethical life, or reveal the content of His ethical nature in a supreme manifestation of saving love. To determine in which sense the words are to be understood, that they may reveal to us the true teachings of Scripture, it is necessary to make a careful study of those passages which they are used to sum up or represent.

In doing this we meet with the following serious difficulties. (1) The lack of unity in the Biblical mode of representation, the view-point of Christ's work and sufferings being diverse and manifold. (2) The fact that Christ's work is set forth both by Himself and the Apoetles in metaphors and symbols which cannot be given a close logical interpretation. It has been well said, 'We make a mistake if we take their symbols of thought as equivalents of spiritual realities, or if we treat their sentences as propositions from which we may deduce the uttermost corollaries. Their figures are illustrations, not definitions; their expressions were forced on them by their past thought and experience, and are flung out towards truth as their best means of approximating to it' (Lewis). (3) Whilefsome of the figures are rooted in popular conceptions of religious service and are drawn from the Jewish sacrificial system, others are bold strokes of the imagination, and are capable of various meanings. (4) The different views held of the Jewish sacrificial system from which the NT figures and expressions are drawn constitute a difficulty. Some regard them as close types and symbols of Christ's work, and give them expiatory value (P. Fairbairn); while others affirm that 'they disclose no trace of the idea of vicarious substitution, nor of propitiation' (Westcott). (5) Some texts used singly seem to teach what other texts contradict, showing that they are loose statements, not to be taken with logical exactness; or that they represent phases of a doctrine and not the whole of it, or that they are metaphorical. (6) The fact that there are two ideas of sacrifice in the OT—one of the priests and the other of the prophets; and that Hebrews and Jn. seem to have worked out their ideas on the basis of the Levitical standpoint, while Jesus and St. Paul represent more the ideas of the prophets. (7) The difficulty of freeing ourselves of a priori ideas in our interpretations of

1. The teachings of Jesus in the Synoptics.—Our first source of information concerning the way we are to understand the vicarious sacrifice of Jesus must be His own teachings. Too many have overlooked this and started with the conceptions of St. Paul, as if the human teacher were a clearer witness than He who was Himself the revelation. If there is any squaring to do, St. Paul must be squared with Jesus, not Jesus with St. Paul, for the Master did not preach a partial gospel. As we study His sayings concerning His sacrifice, we note that He regards it as necessary, voluntary, vicarious, and redemptive, and that He relates it (1) to the establishment of the Kingdom, (2) to the remission of sins, (3) to the ratifying of the covenant. (1) Jesus considers His vicarious sacrifice as necessarily involved in His work of establishing His Kingdom. He opened His ministry with the announcement, 'The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God was not the 'politico-ethical commonwealth' (Pfleiderer) which Jewish prophecy had described, but a spiritual society, established by the grace of God, of righteous men having fellowship with one another and with a common Father. To the founding of His Kingdom He devoted Himself with singleness of heart, understanding well the hazard it involved; for He realized the traditionalism of the age, its formalism, its lack of spiritual vision, its worldly lust and ambition, and He knew full well the opposition He would stimulate and the conflicts He must encounter. The history of the prophets was before Him, and the blood of the martyrs cried to Him from the ground. Even Plato was able to perceive 'that one perfectly just could not appear among the senseless and wicked without provoking a murderous hatred.' The law of righteousness, fundamental in His Kingdom, would, He knew, cut across the self-interests of men, as well as the conservatism of the Rabbinical teachers of the day. Consequently He compares Himself to the good shepherd who lays down his life for the sheep, and states the terms of His discipleship as follows: 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow me' (Lk 922). Nor did He mistake the facts, for early in His career the antagonism developed which increased in intensity until it culminated in the Crucifixion. Only by a denial of His vocation in establishing the Kingdom of God could He have saved His life; only by what was impossible with Him—the forgetting of the will of God and the ceasing to love men. Thus we see that vicarious sacrifice was necessarily involved in His work of establishing His Kingdom, and in this sense was not singular or exceptional, but came under the general law of service. 'Whatever more is to be said as to the significance of Christ's death, this at least is certain, that he died as a faithful martyr for truth and love' (Bruce).

(2) There seems, however, to be something deeper in Jesus' consciousness than the mere fact that His work of founding His Kingdom will so cross the world-spirit of selfishness and sin that He will develop an antagonism which will end in His vicarious death. He clearly relates it to the fact of remission of sins. In Lk 22<sup>57</sup> there is a deeper thought than Hollmann has in mind when he says: 'He is only thinking of the dreary fact that His countrymen are going to treat Him as a criminal instead of as the Holy One of God,' for this passage was associated in the minds of His hearers with a Messianic work of the greatest significance. Stronger statements are found in Mk 10<sup>32, 336</sup>. Jesus is going with His disciples to Jerusalem, and on the way seeks to impress them with what He has stated very earnestly before, that in Jerusalem He will be delivered to mockery and death, but in three days will rise again. This announcement is followed by the ambitious request of James and John for chief seats in His Kingdom. With His mind filled with the thought of His coming passion, He replies to them, 'Ye know not what ye ask. Are ye able to drink the cup which I drink, or be baptized?' Then follows in an address to the disciples, who are indignant at James' and John's request, the notable words, 'For the Son of Man also came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many.' The correct interpretation of this passage is most important, for it is much emphasized by those who seek to find in Jesus' teaching an expiatory reference.

Dr. Baur and others have questioned its integrity, affirming that there is nothing like it in the Synoptics except Mt 2023, which Baur also casts under suspicion, that it is introduced so abruptly as to be questionable, and that it has a Pauline flavour, and if genuine, would not have been omitted by Luke. The criticism, however, seems scarcely valid, for in speaking to the disciples about the nature of greatness—that its value lies in service—it was natural that Jesus should allue to His expected death of which He had previously spoken, using it as an illustration of the point He was enforcing.

The passage has had various interpretations.

Usually much weight has been attached to the word  $\lambda \acute{\nu} \tau \rho o \nu$ , 'ransom,' and its Heb. equivalents, these being assumed to fix its meaning; but this is unsatisfactory, for the LXX has employed  $\lambda \acute{\nu} \tau \rho o \nu$  to translate four different Heb. terms, and besides, since Leave english. since Jesus spoke Aramaic, it is not certain that λύτρον, in the way the LXX uses it, exactly represents what Jesus said. If an exact interpretation were required, we should have to know the Aramaic word of which λύτρον is the translation. Hollmann has discussed this term cogently and ably, showing that Jesus probably did not use the Aram. cognate of kopher, but the equivalent of a Heb. word derived either from της 'to ransom,' το deliver,' or ρτο 'to set free.' Thus λύτρον would mean a purchase price, or a means of setting free. In this case drri, of which much is made, would not signify 'in place of' and establish a thought of substitution, but for, and the passage would mean that Jesus would give His life for the freeing or saving of many—an interpretation which would fit in with the context much better than if  $\lambda \omega \tau \rho \sigma \nu$  is taken as the equivalent of  $k \bar{o} p h e r$ . The idea would then be that men of the world find greatness in assuming superiority over others, whereas Jesus finds it in serving others. But if we assume that λύτρον means in this passage what it means in the LXX tr. of Leviticus, where the main idea of the ransom is that of substituting one thing for another, and if we hold that drri means in place of, the most that we can make out of the passage is that Jesus gives His life as a ransom price to liberate many who are in bondage. But what is the bondage? Taking Jesus' other teachings into account, we cannot doubt that it is bondage to selfishness and sin, who are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness are the selfishness are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness are the selfishness are the selfishness and sin, and the selfishness are the selfishness such selfishnese and world-spirit as James and John had just shown. This would accord with the use of  $\lambda \omega r \rho \delta \omega$  found in 1 P 118 and Tit 214. But even if this is the meaning, the passage does not state the process or manner of the ransom. The thought that because the word is taken from the old sacrificial system we must find there the meaning that is to be attached to it, is not warranted by sound principles of exceesis. That the thought of a vicarious satisfaction offered to God is not intended, is rendered clear by the fact that such an interpretation would contradict the whole tendency of the teachings of Jesus, who constantly emphasized the free grace of God as ready to forgive every re-pentant sinner. Jesus does not conceive of His work as an offering to God, or for the sake of God, but as performed solely in behalf of men. We conclude, then, that this important passage simply means that Jesus vicariously sacrificed His life in order to save men from the selfishness of sin. How He thought His death would accomplish this is not stated, and is a matter of inference. If anything is implied, it is that a complete surrender to the good of men is such a break with the world-spirit which has just revealed itself, even in such good men as the sons of Zebedee, that if men will accept this serving spirit and act from the motive of self-denying love, they will thereby win an inner, moral victory over the world, and thus be freed from its bondage and evil.

Another passage in the Synoptics which has been made to do service in attempts to explain the nature of Jesus' vicarious sacrifice and its relation to the remission of sins, is His utterance upon the cross. The depth of agony there expressed in the cry, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' is said to indicate that in this dark experience ('hrist as a substitute was suffering in its fulness the wrath of God against sin; that He was exiled from the joys of God's presence (Dale), because He was vicariously bearing the consequences of the transgressions of the race. There has been a tendency since asceticism invaded the Church, and the body was made the seat of sin,—and to crucify it was considered a way to please God,—to magnify the importance of the physical sufferings of Christ and make them the supreme sacrifice through which remission of sins has come. This was not the thought of the Apostolic age, which was impressed with His grace rather than by His physical suffer-ings. Christ's death had long been before His contemplation, and from it He never shrank. He spoke of it with calmness and dignity, and some-times with apparent rapture: 'the Son of Man should be glorified' (Jn 12<sup>22</sup>). But when He refers to its modes and agents, He assumes another tone. It is the form not the fact of death from which He appears to shrink. He is overcome by the thought that the agents of His suffering are the religious leaders of His time, and that from His own company has arisen a traitor. Evil is using the occasion of His voluntary, vicarious death as an opportunity for more violent manifestation, and the men He is trying to save are at work to put Him to death. The highest revelation of His grace is the occasion for the highest manifestation of wickedness. Being in the midst of it, not thinking about it, but experiencing it, this fact of evil comes upon Him with an overwhelming reality, and for a moment His sensitive soul is clouded, and He lays hold of a sentence found in Ps 221 and utters it as the most suitable words at hand by which to express His agony. The psalm does not mean abandonment by God, but abandonment to suffering, for later it increasingly expresses the confidence of the sufferer that he will be heard and delivered by God, so that he shall yet come to praise Him; nor does Jesus mean that He is abandoned by God and, substitutionally, under the crushing load of His displeasure, for He stays Himself on the fact that in His agony God is His God. As has been said: 'He who wrestles with death with such pious longing upon His lips has not fully lost His God, but rather presupposes a still abiding relationship with Him' (Wendt). We cannot, therefore, believe that the words on the cross are in any sense a consciousness of God's displeasure.

(3) But not only do the Synoptics relate Christ's vicarious sacrifice to the remission of sins, they also connect it with the ratification of the New Covenant, especially by the words spoken at the Last Supper. The account is found in all the Synoptics and in 1 Co 11. There has been a good deal of criticism concerning the true text, some holding that els αφεσιν άμαρτιῶν and περί πολλῶν, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν are later additions. Some also affirm that η καινή διαθήκη of Lk. are words due to the influence of St. Paul. Some of the reasons suggested for this criticism seem to have weight, but nothing that has been said is at all decisive, so that it is best to let the text stand. To interpret its meaning we must remember the occasion with which it is connected—the celebration of the Pass-This feast was regarded as a memorial of the delivery from bondage, and was at the time of Jesus a joyful festival. In the discourse of the Last Supper the symbolism used is not drawn from the Paschal lamb, but rather from Ex 24, where the sacrifice established to celebrate the new covenant between Jahweh and Israel at Mount Sinai is described. The victim was slain, divided into two parts, and the contracting parties passing between these parts were sprinkled with blood. Thus the covenant was solemnized, and the partaking of the flesh in common indicated communion. As the offering at Sinai sealed the Old Covenant, so Jesus, when about to die, looked upon Himself as the victim whose blood would seal the New Covenant which He had established in inaugurating the Kingdom of God. Says Stevens (Chr. Doct. of Salv. 50):

'The Supper is, then, the symbolic ratification of the New Covenant, analogous to the solemn rite by which the ancient covenant was confirmed by an offering denoting the establishment of communion with God and participation in the blessings of His grace. If regard be had solely to the language of our Lord at the institution of the Supper, it must be admitted, I think, that it is adapted to carry our thoughts not in the direction of the current Jewish ideas of propitiation by sacrifice, but rather toward the conception of a new relation of fellowship with God and obedience to Him constituted by Jesus' death.'

We conclude, therefore, that we do not find in the Synoptics any teaching which warrants the theological deduction often made, that the vicarious sacrifice of Christ is an offering made to satisfy the justice of God, propitiate Him in the sense of removing His displeasure, or secure the remission of sins by removing objective obstacles to the free movement of God's grace.

novement of God's grace.

2. Vicarious sacrifice in the writings attributed to St. John.—The writings which are ascribed to St. John present the vicarious sacrifice of Christ in a somewhat different light from the Synoptics. There is much use, in these writings, of the thought that men become free through light, or that salvation is by revelation. If one walks in the light, that is, holds fellowship with God in righteousness and love, he is saved.

It is not necessary here to go into the critical questions concerning authorship and other special difficulties which these writings present. We believe the balance of argument is in favour of their authenticity. One cannot fail, however, to note that the historic reality which characterizes the Synoptic accounts is here invaded by the subjective, mystic type of thought of the author. The parable gives way to the doctrinal discussions. The doctrine of the Kingdom is supplanted by discourses about eternal life. There is also clear evidence that the discourses of Jesus found in Jn. were not delivered in the form there presented, but have been worked over in the contemplations of the Apostle. St. John's religious consciousness, however, has been developed under the influence of Jesus, and his statements and discourses are built up on the basis of the real sayings of the Master. They are therefore of the highest value.

(a) The Prologue to the Gospel especially draws out the above conception, and makes the object of Christ's vicarious sacrifice the revelation of the Father. By illuminating the world, Jesus saves the world. He shines in on the darkness of human society and thus gives life. 'This is life eternal, that they should know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent' (Jn 173).

But along with this conception of redemption through revelation, there is another line of passages which refer to the sufferings and death of Christ, and which relate these to His saving office. St. John seems to have clearly recognized that sin is a power which excludes the coming in of light, and that therefore it needs in some special sense to be overcome. The first of these passages is the announcement of John the Baptist: Behold the Lamb of (Jn 122). Many have questioned the genuineness of a statement so different from those with which the Synoptics begin the ministry of Christ; but admitting it to be authentic, we have the following facts to note concerning it: (1) It is suggested by Is 13. (2) The phrase o alow means 'who removes,' as the LXX uses other terms for bearing sin. While the words 'the Lamb of God' go back to the Jewish sacrificial system, as here used they are connected with the conception of prophecy and not of ritual. (4) There is certainly nothing clearly to join this passage to the idea of bearing the consequences, or punishment of sin.

In  $3^{14-16}$  is a passage which seems to represent a sentiment of Jesus, probably enlarged and given in the words of the Apostle. It contains the following teaching: (1) That the vicarious sacrifice of Christ originated in the love of God. (2) That acceptance of it by faith secures eternal life. (3) That the lifting up on the cross is an exaltation before men. (4) That it is necessary  $(\delta \epsilon \hat{\imath})$  in order that men should not perish, but have eternal life.

There is no expuatory idea suggested in the passage, but the thought seems to be that the voluntary death of Christ on the cross in the mode in which the love of God asserted itself and became effectual for the salvation of the world' (Terry).

for the salvation of the world' (Terry).

The vicarious sacribee of Jesus is taught also in other passages; as Jn 6<sup>36,51</sup> 10<sup>11,15</sup> 12<sup>24</sup> 15<sup>13</sup>, and in the High Priestly prayer in ch. 17. Jn 6<sup>36,51</sup> is not an allusion to the Lord's Supper, but is connected with the miracle of the loaves, the feeding of the multitude suggesting the idea of spiritual feeding, of Jesus' mission to bring to men spiritual manna by the partaking of which they would have life. It does not refer to atonoment, but to something It does not refer to atonement, but to something present and available.

The dominating idea is that of ethical appropriation, which Lightfoot describes as follows. 'To partake of the Messiah truly is to partake of Himself, His pure nature, His righteousness, His spirit.'
In 10<sup>11, 16</sup> does not speak of an expuatory offering for sin, but rather 'of an exposure to loss of life consequent upon faithful care of the sheep' (Terry). Jn 12<sup>54</sup> states only the general law that to effect results in the moral world one must sacrifice himresults in the moral world one must sacrine infi-aelf, a principle of which the life of Jesus is the supreme illustration. Jn 15<sup>12</sup> is an important passage, as some have made τιθέται την ψιχήν υπέρ point to a substitutionary death of judicial significance; but there is no reason to see in it more than a complete consecration of life to the good of others, that witholds not even when it leads to death. The Juliannine use of notice, favours this interpretation, as does the relation of this passage to the counsel how men should give themselves to one another's good. Nor does the word dyidjese (1719) necessitate a sacrificial or expiatory giving of Himself; for in other passages in Jn. the word is not used in this sense. Moreover, the dis-ciples could not sanctify themselves in this manner. The passage simply means the complete consecration of His life to His work with all that it involved, but it does not give any special interpre-

(b) In the Epotles of St. John we come upon passages which seem more dogmatic, notably 1 Jn 17 20 313 410 In these passages, as in the Fourth Gospel, we have clearly set forth the fact that the work of Christ originates in the love of God, and is 'a move on His part to provide a covering of sins.' The word thanhor, which is tr. 'propitiation,' means covering or blotting out Westcott 'It contains the notion not of appeasing one often in anger, but of altering the character of that which interposes an inevitable obstacle to fellowship. The propitiation, when it is applied to the sinner, neutralizes the sin Deissmann shows that its strict classical meaning is lost in the NT, and that it is applied to any sacrificial offer ing. The context in 1 Jn also is against giving the term a relation to the righteousness of God, since it is deduced from the Divine love (4°). Consequently we must see in this word a covering of sin in the sense of cleansing from it, or proprietion. That which separates from the fellowship of God is not any exigency of the Divine government, or any offence to the Divine nature, but it is the fact that man has chosen to walk in darkness, has participated in the works of the devil. His sin must be put away, and this the blood of Jesus is able to accomplish. It we are asked how, we know no better reply than that of Beyschlag in the following passage (NT Theol ii 448)

"Now what can " over "the sin of the world in the eves of "Now what can" over 'the sin of the world in the sees of God's Only a personality and a deed white b contain the power of a tually delivering the world from sin. For the sin which allows uself to be broken, and to disappear that oils can fool forgive and consider extinct. This is the general view of the CTT and the NT. Christ in His death has gained a power to thus deliver the world from sin. By His union with God and His love to God and the brethren in the conflict, even to blood and death, with the spirit of the world, He has overcome the spirit of selfishiness and evil which rules the world, and in consequence of that He is able to overcome it in every heart into which He finds entrance. He has thus become to the Father the bursty for the purification of humanity and for His sake the Father can offer forgiveness, if men will receive and obey Him.

(c) The ideas found in the Apocalunac are practically the same as those found in the Fourth Gospel and the Johannine Epistles, They have been summarized as follows: '(1) That death is regarded as a great demonstration of love (1a).
(2) It is a death which once for all has achieved something. There is a finished work in it (1a). (3) It is a death which has an abiding power (v.*).

(4) This abiding power is exercised in this, that it enables men to be faithful to Christ under persecution, to suffer with Him rather than sin, finally, rather to die than to sin (121). (5) Hence the blood of Christ both does something once for all, in breaking the bond which sin holds us by, and bringing us into such a relation to God that we are a people of priests; and does something progressively, in assuring our gradual assurilation to Jesus Christ the faithful witness' (Denney, Death of (Arus, p. 250).

3. The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is the writings of St. Paul. St. Paul's doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is very difficult to interpret, although strongly emphasized; and consequently opinions have varied more concerning his meaning than concerning the thought of any other Biblical

have varied more concerning his meaning than concerning the thought of any other Biblical writer.

The reasons for this are (1) The unsystematic form in which he often presents his ideas. (2) The use of diverse figures. (3) His considering the subject from different standpoints. (4) His frequent use of abstract and ideal rather than historic conceptions. (5) The failure to realize that St. Paul at controlled by a practical rather than a theoretical notive that be a writing out of his experience, and trying to adjust his own religious conceptions. (6) His large use of Plantsairal phrases and forms of thought in describing his new experiences making it difficult to decide how literally they are to be taken. (7) His evident desire to find a harmony between certain mongroutes between his old lidets and his present or applicant mongroutes between his old lidets and his present or applicant on extraoxyant emphasis in the minost of logical discussion. (6) The necessary for fixed willing in some succeptions as the sufferings and death of Christ because they were sometiment was inwine his his his facts. (1) The little use to might said expect to the work of control and his taking Adam and the Fall as litera, his is, facts. (1) The little use he makes of the Christ of hospiral and resconding the non-nectical and observation.

Because of these barn teristics we are in interpreting St. Paul to observe the fill wing priciples. (1) Not to be too literal or exact in method or it crowd his figures. (2) To understand that we have to do in anyth with the realistic of low day. (b) The fact that Christ with him is the Christ but with the reflex needs on a single of thomas. (c) To understand that we have to do in anyth with the real-line of the said of low day. (b) That the transe of That his do gifts for practical preposes rather than to any the christ with him and to expense him of the said of the real side of the real proposes rather than the survey rice of the rane on the said of the said of the said of the said of the said of and inner side which we must grasp to understand his real teachings. Most of the theories of vicarious sacrifice which do not accord with our modern ethical spirit and with the principles of our modern thought, arise from making too much of the 'earthen vessels' into which Paul's real beliefs are cast, and it is clear that we must get rid of these to find the 'heavenly treasures.'

Most interpreters see in St. Paul a twofold representation of Christ's vicarious sacrifice, a juridical, based on his Pharisaical conceptions, and an ethico-mystical, a product of his vital religious experience. A. B. Bruce thinks they indicate different stages of the development of the doctrine of reconciliation in the Apostle's thinking, but one can scarcely consider them as 'two doctrines,' for (1) They are wrought out in the same Epistles; (2) They interpenetrate. Pfieiderer explains them psychologically, making them the expression of 'two souls which always strucoled with each allow two souls which always struggled with each other in the breast of the Pharisee and the Apostle Paul, namely, the legal Jewish soul and the evan-gelical Christian soul.' As the juridical concep-tion arises in his discussion with the Jews and has reference to Jewish ideas only, it may be that the juridical element is adopted as a form of argument which will be most convincing to a special class, and that it is not intended for a universal form in which to put the doctrine. We shall, therefore, not depend so much on the form as on the reality which seems to lie behind it—the spiritual idea—in trying to set forth Paul's view. The main positions of the Apostle which bear on his conception of Jesus' vicarious sacrifice can be stated under the following heads:

(1) Man is separated from God by the fact of sin.

This is due (a) to the attitude of God toward sin.

The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, who, light having been given them, are without excuse and are treasuring up for themselves wrath in the day of wrath (Ro 1<sup>186</sup>, Eph 5<sup>5</sup>, Col 3<sup>6</sup>). (b) Man because of sin is at enmity with God, minding the things of the flesh and not the things of the spirit, nor being subject to the law of God (Ro 86-9). For men to be brought back to God they must be led to renounce sin, for God can never allow it or har-

(2) God wants to save men from sin and reconcile them to Himself.—(a) The work of reconciliation, St. Paul says, is begun by God, who was in Christian who sent Him forth (Ro 3<sup>26</sup>, Gal 4\*) to redeem them which were under the Law; and since He 'spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for 'spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not also with him freely give us all things?' (Ro  $8^{28}$ ). In view of these explicit statements, there is no place for the idea that Jesus' vicarious sacrifice was to reconcile God to us. The word  $\kappa \alpha \tau \alpha \lambda \lambda d \sigma \sigma \omega$ , 'reconcile,' is used three times in 2 Co  $5^{18-20}$ , and in each case the reconciliation is to God, and not of God to the world. The noun resultant is twice used in this The noun καταλλαγή is twice used in this passage to indicate something given to us, and reinforces the affirmation of the verb. The peace the sinner receives through this reconciliation is a peace πρὸς τὸν θεόν, toward God, and not a peace of God toward men. Christ, therefore, in seeking the salvation of man, is the expression of God; it is God's action, God's kindness, God's sacrifice. Whatever Christ meant in His life and work God meant. (b) This idea is further enforced by the passages which speak of Christ's work as one of grace (Ro 3<sup>24</sup>): those who would be justified by the Law are fallen away from grace (Gal 5<sup>4</sup>), for salvation is the gift of God (Eph 2<sup>7,8</sup>).

(3) There are certain obstacles to God's free for-giving grace which must be overcome.—(a) Such an obstacle is not the ethical nature of God, or His justice, which demands a propitiatory offering or substitute in punishment to make it possible for Him consistently to forgive. This idea is entirely out of harmony with the passages just referred to, which make God originate the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, and which make Christ's act God's own.

If God is Himself acting in Christ, St. Paul cannot anywhere mean that Jesus is seeking in His sacrifice to obtain something from God which He is not willing to give. It has been well said, 'since God was working in Christ there was nothing in God to was working in Christ there was nothing in Gouldo overcome' (Clarke). Certain passages, however, are said to teach a theory of expitation which has objective reference, and show the necessity of removing obstacles to forgiveness in the nature of God. Some of these are Ro 3<sup>26</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>, Gal 3<sup>13</sup>, and Col 2<sup>14</sup>. St. Paul, it is held, in these passages that sin is an effected to the rightenesses of teaches that sin is an offence to the righteousness of God, and this righteousness must be vindicated and compensated before forgiveness is possible. Bearing in His death the punishment due to us, Christ has satisfied the Divine righteousness, so that God can consistently exercise His grace toward sinners. This makes Christ's vicarious sacrifice penal.

The interpretation is objectionable for the following reasons:—(a) Judicial punishment and forgiveness are incompatible, for forgiveness means the withdrawal and not the infliction of such punishment. The disapproval of God is the soul of the punishment of sin, but this is withdrawn when forgiveness is extended. If it is the purpose of God to reconcile man to Himself, and if He is in the world in Christ seeking to bring this about, the attitude of disapproval of the sinner which makes the penalty of the sin has been cancelled by His own act, and there can be no moral necessity in God which demands a judicial rather than an ethical vindication of His righteousness. ( $\beta$ ) Punishment is non-transferable, and any infliction of it on a substitute is not punishment but something else. (γ) When St. Paul speaks of Christ's sacrifice in relation to us, he always uses ὑπὸρ ἡμῶν 'in our behalf,' not ἀντὶ ἡμῶν, 'instead of us.' (δ) St. Paul's conception of the righteonsness of Cod in act indicate the context of the c God is not judicial but ethical, and it is not satisfied by something offered to it, but by such an expression of it as destroys sin in man. (c) It is difficult to see how, if our sins have been atoned for by a substitutionary sacrifice, faith in Christ is necessary to salvation. When a debt is paid the obligation is released. (f) The idea does not do full justice to God's antagonism to sin, as the extinction of it is more to be desired than the punishment of it.

The statement in Ro 325 that God sent forth Christ to be a propitiation through faith in His blood, to show His righteousness, cannot mean that Christ's vicarious sacrifice is intended to make it righteous for God to forgive sin. els trotettu means to show, or demonstrate. Now, as Tymms has said: 'Before the righteousness of an act can be shown, or proved, or demonstrated, it must actually be righteous in itself. To say that a demonstration of a thing or a quality can produce a thing, or confer the quality demonstrated, is absurd. If God is in Christ, this whole line of interpretation must be cut out. The passage is contradictory and incapable of being understood, if with Sanday ('Romans' in ICC) we reply to the question, Who is propitiated?, 'the answer can only be "God." The word λαστήριον has been given four interpretations, of which we prefer the tr. 'mercy-seat,' since this is its accredited meaning in Biblical Greek, and since the symbolic significance of the mercy-seat made it a fitting figure for the Apostle to use. This interpretation also best explains the to use. This interpretation also best explains the phrase 'in his blood,' and the middle voice employed in the Gr. verb προέθετο, 'set forth for himself.' The thought, therefore, is that God sent forth His Son 'as the reality and fulfilment of all that was symbolized in the mercy-seat.' God will no longer look upon sin, or consider it, in the case of those who by faith in the blood of Christ accept His provision. Thus God's righteousness will be revealed in His grace.

(b) Nor is the obstacle to God's forgiveness 'the Law, of which St. Paul makes so much, considered as a judicial principle, having rights which must be met. It is often said that Christ suffered vicariously to satisfy the claims of the Law, and sometimes this idea of law is developed into a system of moral government which must be vindisystem of horal government which must be vindicated. Gal 3<sup>18</sup> says, 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law.' 'The law' here is manifestly the Mosaic law, and the 'us' cannot mean those who never lived under this law, but must refer to Hebrew Christians. The Jews who were under this discipline were freed from it when they believed in Christ for He established a new covernment. lieved in Christ, for He established a new covenant. St. Paul's language must not here be made uni-St. Paul's language must not here be made universal, for it applies only to a limited class of people. St. Paul clearly tells us that we are justified, not by anything done to or for law, but 'apart from law,' as a pure act of grace. All thought of justification on the principle of law is in Ro 3<sup>20</sup> ruled out. As has been said, Christ's gospel is not a 'veiled legalism,' and He did not work out for men a 'law-righteousness which they could not have obtained for themselves.' Says W. N. Clarke (Outline of Theol. p. 336): 'If grace comes simple and whole-hearted into the world, it does not come to satisfy legal demands or win lawdoes not come to satisfy legal demands or win law-righteousness. . . God does not deal with men through Christ in the character of lawgiver, or judge, or in any special character, but in His real character as God, His own very self, in personal relations with His creatures as their very selves.' Indeed, what is the Law in any true sense but God revealing to men His nature as righteous? It is not an abstract thing apart from God that has rights, or can make demands, or needs vindication. Our relations are with a person and not with a system.

There is, however, according to St. Paul, one thing necessary in order to make it possible for God to forgive, and that is, His opposition to sin must be shown. He must be Himself revealed as One who wants men to leave off sinning and become righteous. God could not be satisfied without providing some adequate revelation of this fact, and

He has provided it in Christ.
(4) The reconciliation which God desires to effect is accomplished by the vicarious sacrifice of Christ; for this Christ was sent into the world; for this He lived, suffered, and died. St. Paul makes much of the cross. It is the heart of his theology, because it is God's supreme self-expression in sacrifice to sinful man. In 2 Co 5<sup>15</sup> we read: 'He died for all, that they which live should no longer live unto themselves, but unto him who for their sakes died and rose again.' No clearer passage is needed to show that God's forgiving grace is mediated through the vicarious sacrifice of Christ, and that His inmost heart is thus made manifest. Christ became man's Saviour (a) by His absolute 'For as by one man's disobedience obedience. many were made sinners, so by the obedience of one shall many be made righteous' (Ro 519). Christ has resisted sin unto suffering, sacrificed the creature will to the will of God, become obedient unto death, even the death of the cross (Ph 26), and so has conquered sin by breaking through its general dominion. To those who join themselves to Him, He imparts the same power through the influence of the Spirit. (b) He has also vicariously our sins. St. Paul does not say that He has borne the consequences of them, or the punishment of them, but He has taken our sins on Himself in such a way that they have been a burden to His heart and caused Him to suffer. He has borne them in the sense that He has borne with them. To God incarnate in Christ, sin, as the despoiler of those whom He loves and wishes good, must be offensive, must be an affliction, a source of suffering and pain. God's sympathy is always being taxed by the evil of the world, His holiness is always being offended, and His heart is ever being grieved. being offended, and His heart is ever being grieved. In a real and vital way this is sin-bearing—this enduring it in patience, this carrying it upon the heart. Another way in which Christ bears our sins is in labouring to overcome them. Sin puts on God a great task, that of suffering and labouring to save the world. This sin-bearing is what St. Paul refers to when he says, 'Him who knew not sin he made sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in him' (2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>). This does not mean that He made Him a sinner This does not mean that He made Him a sinner, for God was in Christ; but in His work of expressing God's love for men, Christ so identifies Him-self with humanity that He feels its sin as a personal burden. It is an utter mistake to interpret this passage, as many have done, to mean that Christ was made to suffer the punishment of sin, or that guilt was imputed, or transferred to Him, which is an ethical impossibility. The bold figure simply refers to such an identification with men as simply refers to such an identification with their as to make their burden of sin Christ's own. The much quoted passage in Gal. (3<sup>13</sup>), 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law, having become a curse for us; for it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree,' is to be explained in a similar manner. This is a strong expression based of the curse of the gross had the similar manner. This is a strong expression based on Dt 21<sup>22,23</sup>. Christ's death on the cross had the outward appearance of His being an accursed criminal, and by metonymy expresses the humilia-tion and sin-bearing of Christ in 'His vicarious identification with man under the curse of the law.' Says Terry: 'He entered into the depths of human suffering, and felt most keenly the bitter exposure of sinful man to the curse of violated law; and, being Himself personally without sin and without any condemnation from law, He was the more capable of becoming "greatly amazed and sore troubled" over the desperate situation of sin-cursed humanity under the curse of holy law.' (c) In bearing sin, Christ condemns it and establishes God's righteousness, establishes it by manifesting it. The punishment of sin is not the strongest way of expressing one's condemnation of it; a stronger way is to be willing to endure sacri-fice to save one from it. It must be an awful thing, if God will go to such lengths of suffering to rescue men from its evil (Ju 316). Men risk their lives only to save their fellows from calamitous dangers. God suffers in Christ, only because He dangers. God suffers in Christ, only because He looks at sin as an awful, destructive fact. Nowhere is the righteousness of God, as over against sin, seen so clearly as in the death of Jesus. (d) The vicarious sacrifice of Christ also expresses God's willingness to save. 'God commendeth his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us (Ro 5<sup>3-11</sup>). It is a voluntary expression of interest in us that withholds not at the greatest possible cost; and wins gratitude and response if anything can awaken them. Love can go no farther. In such a work God does His utmost to bring men to Himself. The vicarious element in Christ's life satisfies God, for it is God's highest effort for man's recovery; and it satisfies man, for it shows Jesus as his personal Saviour.

(5) The vicarious sacrifice of Christ becomes available through faith.—Men cannot maintain a passive relation to Christ and be saved from sin; they must join themselves to Him by a living faith. They must die with Him on the cross, and rise with Him to newness of life. They must be one with Him in the fellowship of His sufferings. Christ must be in them their hope of glory. 'I have no longer,' cries the Apoetle, 'but Christ liveth in me; and the life I now live, I live by faith in the Son of God' (Gal 2°). By fellowship with Christ the old man is put off and dies. The Christ living in its becomes the power by which we break absolutely with the sin of the world, and win a victory over it. This is being saved—being delivered from sin and brought to righteousness. A man who in the obedience of faith—faith being not the intellectual principle of belief, but the act of trust—joins himself to Christ, brings himself thereby into fellowship and moral unity with Him, and becomes possessed of the mind of Christ the mind of hostility to sin and love of the good (Gal 2°). Christ who has ascended in the Resurrection, descends into the heart of the believer in order to assist and complete the freeing, saving work. It is because of this that St. Paul lays such emphasis on the Resurrection in connexion with his doctrine of salvation. He 'was delivered up for our trespasses, and was raised for our justification' (Ro 4°). Having been reconciled to God, the believer lives the new life of righteonness by faith, which becomes a continuous experience, and will be consummated in an eternal salvation.

(6) St. Paul also has a doctrine of a new humanity obtained through Christ's receious surrifier, which grows out of the importance he attaches to human solidarity. Salvation is not only individual, but also social. This feature of St. Paul's thought has recently been worked out in an interesting way by Dr. Olin A Curtis in The Christian Faith (pp. 317-337). The end of God in redeniption is 'to obtain a race of holy men.' 'God wanted an entangled race.' While Christ is the source of help and strength, the social solidarity of men makes it essential that the social organism be redeemed, for men must help to complete one another. The new humanity built up in Christ becomes a body of which He is the living head, and for which He ever

4. The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice in Hebrews. The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice as set forth in Hebrews, although elaborate, need not be especially considered here, as this Epistle given us no new information of importance. The subject is extensively discussed with special reference to the symbolism of the OT, the doctrine being set forth largely in terms of sacrifice. We do not hear anything about 'the law,' or about satisfaction to it or to God's righteousness. Here Christ is a pure offering in sacrifice to God, but His death is not received as a substitutionary expiation. The absence of this idea is the more remarkable that the author so closely approximates it. Had he shared this conception, it is not easy to see why he did not bring it forward in connexion with such assertions as that Christ unde propitiation (λλάσκεσθαι) for the sins of the people (2<sup>17</sup>), tasted death for every man (2<sup>18</sup>), and was offered to bear away the sins of many (9<sup>28</sup>).

'Not the satisfaction of the law, the removal of the curse, the endurance of the penalty of an, but a favine fitness, or decorant, is sasigned as the reason why the Author of salvation should be made perfect through sufferings (21"). Elsewhere he deduces the necessity of Josas death from the very fact that He is a priest. It is the calling of a priest to offer su rifee, hence "this high priest must also have somewhat to offer" (4"), and that i'mone what can on the His own life. In shother place this necessity is derived from the Import of the word hadron. This word has two meanings "covenant" and 'testament. Our author passes from one meaning to the other in the elaboration of his argument. The first covenant was sealed by a death, in consequence of a death; therefore it was needful that the establishment of the New Covenant should be ratified by a death, that is, by the death of Christ' (Stevens, op. off. 781.).

One interesting fact concerning this Epiatle is the ethical meaning the author attaches to the whole conception of sacrifice, making it, as applied to Christ, an entirely different thing from what it is in the Levitical ritual and ceremonies. The Epistles of St. Peter will not be considered.

The Epistles of St. Peter will not be considered, for they shed no new light on the problem under discussion.

5. Summary of results.—In concluding our investigation of vicarious sacrifice in the NT, we summarize our results as follows: (1) The doctrine of vicarious sacrifice is the very heart of the Scriptures. It is the harmonious note of all the Biblical writers, finding expression in the OT sacrifices, in the life and teachings of Jesus, and in the writings of the Apostles. God is seeking to develop a righteous people, a holy race, and the process or method is by vicarious sacrifice.

(2) In the Scriptures the doctrine is largely expressed in figures, and symbols, and current conceptions which make its interpretation difficult, and have led to much misunderstanding. Many theories have been built up on what close analysis shows to be only a metaphor, or Jewish sacrificial term. We must not strain popular language to give exact scientific statement.

(3) While Biblical writers assert their individuality in stating the fact of vicarious sacrifice, setting it forth in different ways, they all agree in what it is and what it does—that it is a method of God to save men from sin and bring them into fellowship with Himself.

(4) The Scriptures discuss the doctrine of vicarious sscrifice from different standpoints and in different relations, and do not give us what may be called a theory of the subject. It is proper for us to attempt to construct one from what is revealed, but we must have in mind the significance of the Scripture presentation.

(5) St. Paul differs from other writers in having a theology, and in having worked over the facts of Christ's vicarious life and death in the crucible of his own thinking. In doing this he has had in mind a special class of hearers, the Jewish law under which they and he have lived, and the relation of Christ's work to it; and he has expressed his thought in terms of the Pharisaic theology in which he has been trained, and has used certain conceptions from Palestinian and Alexandrian sources which we must take into account in interpreting him. While he has developed his conceptions in legal forms, he has saved himself from legalism by exhibiting the ethical content of Christ's work and vitally relating it to life.

(6) The doctrine of vicarious sacrifies is grounded not in a judicial or rectoral relation of God, but in a deeply personal fact and expression. (a) It is founded by God in His personal interest in and love for men. It is the unfolding of God's heart to ainners, and God is in Christ reconciling the world to Himself. (b) It seeks a personal end, namely, the salvation of sinners and their restoration to the personal relation of fellowship with God. (c) All theories, therefore, which make it effect a change in God are un Scriptural. The fact that Christ in the Logos effectually routs such conceptions.

(7) Christ's vicarious atonement, because grounded in personal relations, is to be explained not as a judicial, but as a deeply ethical and spiritual fact. It embodies and represents not God's rectoral or judicial relations, but His moral nature. It is a transaction in the realm of spirit, expressing in an empirical event a spiritual principle. We can interpret it only by rising above the abstract fictions of logic into the realm of the realities of the moral life, seeing in it not forensic transactions, but the living action of spiritual laws. Therefore, it is not (a) a compensation to law, as if law had an objective reality, and rights apart from the Being whose expression it is; or (b) a compensation to justice, as if justice and grace were in antagonism in the Divine nature, and this attributes were more than diverse reflexions of the action of His harmonious being, or as if a mechanical device, of which God is Himself the author, can compensate His justice. 'Divine justice seeks the triumph of good over evil, and hence identifies itself with love. (c) It is, therefore, in no sense penal. It really impeaches the moral government of God to introduce an expedient, in order to render it possible for a moral Being who has created men, and taken upon Himself responsibilities in so doing, to be able to forgive His erring creatures. All these and other theories are developed out of the old idea of God's transcendence, considering Him as a Being above, ruling from without, a King on His throne, a Judge on His judicial bench, at least a Being separate, outward, remote, when the true conception is that of His immanence, as One who acts in the world, tabernacles with men, entangles Himself with our life. This is the Scriptural idea: 'In him we live and move and have our being.

(8) Vicarious sacrifice is an expression and revela-tion of God. This the Scriptures abundantly teach. It manifests God's feelings about sin, the intense opposition with which He regards it; and it reveals God's love for the sinner, the depth and power and sacrificial character of it, leading even to suffering and death.

(9) The work of Jesus in salvation is closely related to the Kingdom of God. The teachings of Jesus centre about this Kingdom. He dwells on it, and puts it forth as the thing He is come to establish on the earth. But men can enter this Kingdom only by availing themselves of the benefits of the vicarious sacrifice of Christ. They must thus come to know God, and live in that spiritual fellowship with Him which constitutes the social bond of His Kingdom.

(10) The mediation of Christ's sacrifice is rendered available through faith. Not all receive its benefits as they would if it were a penal satisfaction rendered to law or Divine majesty. It must be changed from an outer to an inner fact, to an experience of life, and this is possible only through a living faith which unites men to God in obedience and fellow-ship. By the personal participation in Christ's vicarious work for us, we become 'partakers of the divine nature' (2 P 1*), and Christ comes to 'live within us,' 'our hope of glory' (Gal 220, Col 127). God's method of salvation, therefore, is by faith, bringing the soul into constant and living contact with One who embodies the higher spiritual life. We are not saved by example, but by touch.

(11) Salvation through the appropriation of Christ's vicarious sacrifice is a continuous process, and not a finished work. His life and death are historic facts, but they are perpetuated in their meaning in this, that Christ has passed into the heavens, where He abides as our perpetual Mediator. the was 'raised for our justification'; but, more than that, He has come to us invisibly in the person of His Spirit, who continues His work by taking on Himself the burden of trying to influence us to accept the benefits of Christ's sacrifice and God's forgiving grace. 'The eternal Spirit and God and Christ are all one in this ministry of reconciliation, and the Lord Christ has no more finished His work of mediation than has the Holy Father or the Holy Spirit finished yearning for mankind '(Terry).

(12) Christ's vicarious sacrifice has constituted a new humanity, for it is not simply an individual, but a racial fact, seeking to produce a redeemed human family, that shall constitute the very 'body of Christ.' There is a profound meaning in the intercessory prayer of Jesus that we may be one, as He and the Father are one,—'I in them and they in me,'—and to the effect that we may be 'sanctified by the truth' and 'perfected in one,' and finally be with Him where He is, participating in the glory which He had with the Father before the world was (Jn 17<sup>19-24</sup>). St. Paul has this end in mind in Eph 2<sup>6</sup>, where he speaks about being raised up with Christ, and coming to sit with Him in the heavenlies. The discipline of life is to help in completing our work of preparation, and in enabling us to realize the great consummation of our salvation in Christ. our salvation in Christ.

To the mind of Jesus there is only one kind of victory. It is not the triumph over social and financial difficulties which issues in worldly express but that mastery over our lower worldly success, but that mastery over our lower nature and the powers of evil within and around us which issues in self-control, and the subjection of the whole life to the will of God. It was the victory which He Himself gained, and which His true disciples are enabled to achieve through His aid and guidance. This victory brings with it such blessings as forgiveness, deliverance from the dominion of sin and from the fear of death, a deep sense of the moral order of the world, peace with God, and life ever-DUGALD CLARK. lasting.

VINE, VINEYARD (ἀμπελών).—Vine-culture was one of the oldest industries in Palestine. This is attested by the presence of rock-hewn wine-presses and traces of ancient vine terraces where all is wilderness to-day. Work in the vineyard furnished occupation to many (Mt 20<sup>16</sup>. 21<sup>28</sup>). Landowners planted vineyards, and let them to husbandmen (Mt 21<sup>23f.</sup> etc.). The vineyard requires much care and attention. It is surrounded by a dry-stone wall, a bank of thorns, or fence of prickly pear. If it be on a slope, the terraces must be kept in good repair, lest the soil be washed away by winter rains. The ground is well worked with the hoe, and thoroughly cleansed of alien roots. Pruning and thoroughly creatives of the blossom is out in April and May; the vintage is general in Sept., but compound earlier in the Jordan Valley. The but somewhat earlier in the Jordan Valley. tower' (Mt 2133 etc.) is the shelter for the watchman who guards the crop against injury from man and beast.

The familiar form of the vine, with its abundant and luxuriant branches, would lend itself all the more readily to the allegorical use of Jesus, inasmuch as 'in the OT, and partially in Jewish thought, the vine was the symbol of Israel, not in their national, but in their Church capacity' (Edersheim, LT ii. 520; cf. Jn 15). See next article.

The fig and the vine are often closely associated (Lk 13°). The mod. Arab. karm stands for both vineyard and fig-orchard. From the Mishna we gather that 200 years after Christ vine-culture was still a flourishing industry in Palestine. With the coming of the Arabs, vineyards almost entirely disappeared. During the last cent. the industry has in some measure revived under the influence of the German and Jewish colonists in Palestine, and the French in the Lebanon. Both E. and W. of Jordan the vine is now largely cultivated. The grapes of Eshcol are in high repute.

VINE, ALLEGORY OF THE .- In the allegory of the vine (Jn 151-10) Christ describes the close relation which exists between the disciples and Himself, and impresses on them the necessity of the continuance of this intimate union as the indis-pensable condition of fruitfulness on their part. The figurative side of the allegory is not developed first and then followed by the interpretation, but figure and interpretation are woven together throughout the passage. When we separate them we find that the figurative material is comparatively slight. It presents to us the picture of a vine tended by a husbandman who takes away the unfruitful branches and cleanses the fruitful, i.e. unfruitful branches and cleanses the fruitin, s.c. cuts off from them all useless shoots, that they may become more productive. Attention is also directed to the fact that the unfailing condition of fruit-bearing is that the branch abide in the vine. If by any chance it is separated from the parent stock, it is of no more use, but is cast forth from the vineward and withers away, and is fit only for the vineyard and withers away, and is fit only for firewood.

In the interpretation Christ Himself is the vine ('the true vine' is the phrase used, of which we shall discuss the significance presently); His Father is the husbandman, believers, especially the disciples, are the branches. As there are unfruitful branches in the natural vine, so there may be some who, in spite of their communion with Christ, yet prove unproductive. The fate which overtakes them is similar to that of the unfruitful branches of the natural vine. The Heavenly Husbandman severs the connexion between them and Christ (v.2a). Wherein fruitfulness consists Christ does not say. Some take it as the keeping of His commandments (v. 10), and the practice of that righteousness whereby the soundness of the tree is proved (Mt 7<sup>16</sup> 3<sup>1-21</sup>), while others think specially of that Apostolic work which is to fall to the disciples (so Bruce, Training of the Twelve, p. 402). By the cleansing of the branches (v.2b) we must understand such Divine dealings as tend to greater fruitfulness in the life of the believer. The process of cleansing in the natural vine suggests to us the chastening discipline to which the Father sub-jects believers (so de Wette). But in proceeding to speak of the disciples, to whom He now directly refers as the branches, Christ gives a more general interpretation of the figure of cleansing. are already clean, He says (v.), on account of the word which He has spoken to them, i.e. the revelation He has given them has had a purifying influence upon their life. The vital matter for them is to continue in such close relationship to Christ, whose word has had this cleansing influence upon them, that they may ever remain clean. Therefore He proceeds to insist upon the necessity of their abiding in Him, i.e. making Him the source from which they derive all their strength and nourishment (v.4). This is the indispensable condition of fruitfulness in the spiritual life (vv.4 5).

Before proceeding to describe with greater fulness the blessed results that follow from such close adherence to Him, Christ pauses to indicate the fate of those who sever their connexion with Him (v. 6). They are like the branches that have been broken off from the vine, which are cast out of the vineyard and wither away, and are gathered to-gether and burned. Some would find an exact equivalent to all the details in this description. The casting forth corresponds to their exclusion from the Church, the withering to their loss of spiritual life, the gathering to the work of the angels (Mt 13<sup>30, 30</sup>), and the fire to Gehenna. In any case the language indicates the certainty of the destruction that awaits all who break away from destruction that awaits all who break away from their adherence to Christ. In contrast to this, Christ proceeds to describe the condition of those who abide in Him. United to Him in close communion, they will obtain whatsoever they ask (v.7). The result will be abundant fruitfulness to the glory of the Father, whereby they will become true disciples of Christ (v.8). The exhortation to abide in Him is finally strengthened by an appeal to the example of God and Christ in their appeal to the example of God and Christ in their relation to one another. Christ's love to the disciples is like the love of the Father to the Son. As Christ abides in the love of the Father by keeping His commandments, so will the disciples abide in the love of the Son if they keep His commandments (vv. 9. 10).

Such is the course of the allegory. The following points in connexion with it may be briefly discussed:

1. What is meant by the true (αληθινή) vine? It is often taken as suggesting that the natural vine only imperfectly represents the idea of the communion of Christ with believers. But why should the vine be selected rather than any other plant? And in what respect is the organic relationship suggested by the figure only imperfectly represented by the natural vine? H. Holtzmann understands the phrase as meaning that Christ is the vine which belongs to the higher world and has been planted by God in the midst of mankind; and he finds here another instance of the Platonic tendency of the Fourth Gospel to regard sensible things as imperfect copies of archetypes which exist in the world above (Handcom. ad loc. and p. 35). Calvin takes the phrase as equivalent to Ego vere sum vitis'; and van Koetsveld (De Gelijkenissen van den Zaligmaker, ii. 199 f.), on the analogy of the true light (1°), and the true bread (6°2°3°), understands it as meaning the vine which may be called so in truth, and does not merely bear the name and appearance of such. But in the case of the true light and the true bread we can understand the force of the adjective in this sense, as light and bread are metaphors which we are in the habit of employing in a spiritual reference, and it is proper to emphasize the fact that, for the illumination and nourishment of the spiritual life, a higher light and bread than the natural are necessary. But before we can the natural are necessary. But before we can understand the force of the adjective as applied to the vine, we must recognize in what sense it to the vine, we must recognize in what sense it is appropriate to introduce the vine metaphorically in a religious reference. The Old Testament supplies the connexion. The vine was a familiar metaphor as applied to Israel (Jer 2<sup>21</sup>, Ezk 15<sup>1st</sup>.) 19<sup>1ost</sup>., Ps 80<sup>2st</sup>., cf. Is 5<sup>1st</sup>.). But Israel had proved unfaithful to her calling. She had 'turned into the degenerate plant of a strange vine' (Jer 2<sup>21</sup>). Delitzsch has further pointed out that the vine is used as a symbol of the Messiah (Iris, Eng. tr. pp. 184–186). It is with reference to this familiar metaphor that Christ calls Himself the true vine. The idea that was held before Israel in the prophetic application to her of the figure of the vine is realized in Him and His disciples.

2. What is the relationship between Christ and the disciples indicated by the mutual abiding in one another? Viewed from the side of the disciples, this relation is presented as an injunction, 'Abide in me'; from the side of Christ as a promise, 'and I in you,' i.e. and I will abide in you (v.'). This is the usual interpretation of the verse, though Bengel makes the injunction embrace the whole: 'Facite ut maneatis in me et ut ego maneam in vobis.' In the following verses more particular statements occur, which seem to define more clearly the relationship thus indicated. But the difficulty is to determine to which of the sides of Thus in v.7 we have the phrase, 'If ye abide in me and my words abide in you.' Does the latter clause take the place of the 'and I in you' of v.4, or is it a fuller description of the clause immediately preceding it, thus corresponding to the 'abide in me' of v.4? Either view may be adopted with some show of reason. In support of the first, it may be pointed out that, on this interpretation, the phrase exactly corresponds to the 'He that abideth in me and I in him' of v. 5. On the other hand, when it is remembered that the 'and I in you' of v.4 contains a promise, and that in v.7 the two clauses together embrace the condition upon which the promise which immediately follows ('ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you') depends, there seems good ground for taking the clause 'and my words abide in you' as a more definite statement of what is involved in our abiding in Christ; while the promise which immediately succeeds may be regarded as presenting under a new aspect what is meant by Christ's abiding in us.

Again, in v. we have another aspect of abiding presented, 'Abide ye in my love,' i.e. continue to be the objects of my love. Here again the question arises, To which of the two abidings does the phrase apply? To our abiding in Christ, or to Christ's abiding in us? The parallelism of the phrase to the 'abide in me' of v. 4 favours the first alternative. On the other hand, it may be pointed out that while the phrase occurs in v. 9 as an injunction, it is repeated in v. 10 as a promise, conditional on our keeping Christ's commandments. Now, in the interpretation of v. 7 suggested above, to have Christ's words abiding in us, i.e. to keep His commandments, corresponds to the 'abide in me' of v. 4. Here, therefore, the promise which is held forth to those who keep the commandments, i.e. to those who abide in Christ, will correspond to the promise of v. 4, and to abide in Christ's love will represent under a new aspect what is meant by Christ's abiding in us.

Each of the ways of regarding the verses in question yields a view of the relationship of the believer and Christ to one another which seems to be true in fact, and to harmonize with the general Johannine conception of that relationship. To have Christ's words abiding in us is a phrase which, in view of the importance assigned in this Gospel to the word, may well represent what is meant by abiding in Christ. It is in the word that Christ reveals Himself, and that only is the true relationship to His Person which involves trustful acceptance of, and obedience to, His word (8<sup>31</sup> 14<sup>15. 21</sup>). On the other hand, just because of the importance thus assigned to the word as that through which Christ reveals Himself, the phrase may likewise denote the manner in which Christ abides in the believer. The sanctifying power of the word has already been referred to in the passage (v.³). The words which Christ speaks, they are spirit and they are life  $(6^{63})$ , and to have them abiding in us is already to have everlasting life  $(5^{24})$ . In like manner, to abide in Christ's love is a phrase which may equally well describe either our abiding in Him or His abiding in us. Our abiding in Christ may in v.<sup>4</sup> be the condition upon which the promise of Christ's abiding in us is given. But in the spiritual life it is difficult to draw a hard and fast line between conditions and consequences. conditions upon which promises of blessing are fulfilled become an integral part of the blessed-ness bestowed. To abide in Christ's love is at once the condition and the constituent of spiritual blessedness. It is at once our abiding in Christ and Christ's abiding in us. These two abidings seem to be the same relation regarded from dif-ferent sides. On the one side we have the subjective aspect of the relation presented, on the other the objective (Weiss, Die johan. Grundbegriffe, p. 71); on the one side the attitude of faith towards the Saviour, on the other the response of the Saviour to the faith which unites the believer to Him. See also art. ABIDING.

3. Can we accept the allegory as authentic in its present form? It has been felt by some that that form is far from satisfactory. Illustration and form is far from satisfactory. Illustration and interpretation are mixed together throughout. No clear and connected picture, of which the details are in due course interpreted, is brought before the mind; but the figure of the vine is used as the foundation upon which is based a series of metaphors, loosely strung together, describing the relation of Christ and the believer to one another. When we compare it with the parables and similitudes of the Synoptic Gospels, we realize at once what a vast difference there is between them. It has been suggested that the allegory of the vine may have been originally a parable which John has worked up into its present form. B. Weiss believes he can find the original elements in vv.<sup>2,4,6</sup>, and thinks that it had taught that, as the husband-man does all in his power to make the vine productive, but if his efforts are in vain casts forth the worthless branches and burns them up, so God's purpose in the planting of the Kingdom of God in Israel had been to increase the fruitfulness of its members, and if that purpose is not fulfilled the only result will be the exclusion of Israel from the Kingdom. The main point in the parable could not have been that the increasing fruitfulness of the branches depended upon their abiding in the vine, but that this abiding might be forfeited by con-tinued unfruitfulness. But the Evangelist, who ever puts the personal relation to Christ in the foreground, made this abiding in Christ as the

A. Is the present place of the allegory in the Gospel the correct one? Sanday (Fourth Gospel, p. 231) thinks that it belongs to an earlier and more didactic period in the life of Christ, and that it is out of place in the present speech, of which the object is to comfort the disciples in view of their Lord's departure. De Wette and B. Weiss bring forward the same objection. The latter thinks that the allegory in its original parabolic form, of which the main point was a warning against unfruitfulness, belongs to the period of crisis in the condition of fruitfulness in the religious life the central thought, though in vv. 2. 6 the original tendency of the parable is still apparent (in Meyer's Kommentar, 1893, ad loc., and Leben Jesu ii. 334 ff.). Jülicher thinks that Weiss is influenced by a desire to make John approach as closely as possible to the Synoptists; and while he does not believe the allegory as preserved by John to be genuine, confesses himself unable to conjecture what its original form was, supposing it to be

life of Christ, when the multitudes who had been attracted to Him fell away, and He foresaw that even one of the Twelve was to prove unfaithful. The Evangelist has brought together in these farewell speeches all that seemed to deal with the selfrevelation of Christ to believers; and as the interpretation which he put upon the allegory, by making the central point of it an exhortation to abide in Christ, led him to include it in this category, he has inserted it here (Leben Jesu, ii. 334). Bruce meets the objection that the allegory is out of place in the farewell discourse, by showing that Christ's object in that discourse is not merely to comfort the disciples in view of His departure, but to pre-pare them for the continuance of His work. When we realize that this is the purpose of the speech in which it occurs, the aptness of the allegory cannot, he thinks, be questioned (Training of the Twelve, p. 401).

YINEGAR (650s, acctum) was credited with manithe medicinal its sole use. It served as the drink of the lower orders, especially slaves; † and it was the only refreshment allowed to soldiers while engaged in active service. gaged in active service. 'The vigilant humanity of Julian,' says Gibbon, ‡ 'had embarked a very large magazine of vinegar and biscuit for the use of the soldiers, but he prohibited the indulgence of wine.

It is twice mentioned in the story of the Cruci-kion. The quaternion of soldiers (cf. Jn 1923) fixion. charged with the execution had with them a jar of their posca, as it was termed; and, when they had accomplished their laborious task, they refreshed themselves from it. The bystanders, led by the exultant priests, were meanwhile mocking the exultant priests, were meanwhile mocking the meek Sufferer and deriding His Messianic claim. 'He is King of Israel,' they cried: 'let him come down now from the cross, and we will believe on him.' The soldiers heard the taunt and joined in (Lk 23<sup>35-45</sup> = Mt 27<sup>35-44</sup> = Mk 15<sup>25-22</sup>).

Again, after He had uttered His cry of desolation: Eli, Eli, lama 'azabhtāni (see DERELICTION), Jesus moaned, 'I thirst'; and one of the bystanders, probably a Roman soldier, moved by pity, took a sponge and, dipping it in the posca, put it on the end of a hyssop reed. His comrades interfered. Ignorant of Hebrew, they took Eli for the name Elias, and supposed that Jesus was invoking the help of one of that name. 'Hold!' they cried. 'Let us see if Elias is coming to save him.' But the man persisted in his humane purpose, and held up the sponge to the parched lips (Mt  $27^{45-50} = Mk$   $15^{23-57} = Jn$   $19^{23-20}$ ).

St. Mark's account is much confused. It represents the offering of the vinegar as an act of mockery, in opposition to both St. Matthew and St. John, and the cry, 'Hold,' etc., as uttered, without any apparent provocation, by the man with the reed. There is here an example of the style of modification which the Evangelic tradition—in this instance correctly reproduced by St. Matthew—suffered in the process of oral transmission: (1) The interference of the bystanders was omitted;

It is nothing strange that Jesus accepted the posca after refusing the 'myrrhed wine' (Mk 15<sup>22</sup> = Mt 27<sup>24</sup>). He refused the narcotic (see CRUCIFIXION), He accepted the refreshment.

DAVID SMITH. YIOLENCE.—In Lk 314 part of the advice given by John the Baptist to the soldiers was, 'Do vio-lence to no man' (μηδένα διασείσητε), the verb mean-ing, 'like concutio in juridical Latin, to extort ing, the concuto in juridical Latin, to extent from one by intimidation money or other property' (Grimm-Thayer). The word occurs again in Mt 11<sup>12</sup>, where the adjective 'violent' is also found in AV. The adverb 'violently 'appears in Lk 8<sup>33</sup> AV, 'the herd ran violently (ωρμησεν) down a steep place,' and in Lk 16<sup>16</sup> RV, 'every man entereth violently into it' (βιάζεται). Interest centres chiefly on the two passages Mt 11<sup>12</sup> and Lk centres chiefly on the two passages Mt 11<sup>12</sup> and Lk 16<sup>16</sup>, which are so much alike, though in different contexts, that they are obviously two versions of the same saying. We place them side by side in order that they may be more easily compared.

Mt 1112 18. Lk 1616. (a) πάντις γὰρ οἰ προφήται καὶ (a) ὁ νόμος καὶ οἰ προφήται νόμος ἴως 'Ιωάννου προιφήτιυσαν μίχρι 'Ιωάννου. ό νόμος τως 'Ιωάννου προεφήτευσαν (v.13). (b) ἀπό δὶ τῶν ἡμερῶν 'Ιωάννου τοῦ βαπτιστοῦ ἐως ἀρτι. (β) ἀτὸ τότε. (c) ή βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν βιάζεται. (d) καὶ βιασταὶ ἀρτάζουσιν αὐτήν. (γ) ή βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ εὐαγ-(d) nai mas eis aurie Biagerai.

It is evident that a, b, d closely correspond to  $\alpha, \beta, \delta$ ; why, then, should not c be taken to convey the same idea as  $\gamma$ ? This is the view of Melanthe same idea as  $\gamma$ : This is the wew of Metal-chthon, Stier, Banks, and others, who hold that  $\beta dd$  ferai in Mt. is the Middle voice, as it undoubtedly is in the last clause of Luke. The translation will then be, 'the kingdom of heaven advanceth violently,' it forcibly introduces itself, coming with urgency and beating down all obstacles, 'sese vi quasi obtrudit' (Bengel, who adds 'ssene LXX βιάζομαι ponunt. vim adhibeo'). This 'sæpe LXX βιάζομα: ponunt, vim adhibeo'). This is quite in keeping with the context, where Christ is extolling the work which John the Baptist had done as a pioneer and forerunner (cf. Mt 3<sup>61</sup>, Mk 1<sup>5</sup>, Lk 7<sup>29</sup>). It may be illustrated by the parables of the Mustard Seed and the Leaven (Mt 13<sup>31-25</sup>), and it has the great advantage of conveying the same sense as the parallel clause in Lk. 'the kingdom of God is preached.' The only serious objection urged God is preached.' The only serious objection urged against such a rendering by Meyer, Alford, and Bruce (in Expos. Gr. Test.) is that it would be inconsistent with the words following—'the violent take it by force.' Is there necessarily any inconsistency, however? May we not have here one of those passages where by a slight change in the expression, by a turning of the coin, as it were, a new and complementary truth is conveyed? Would there be any inconsistency if one were to say 'the train is advancing quickly, and those who are quick succeed in entering it'? On the other hand, the translation of the EV is open to the charge of being tautological. being tautological.

βιάζεται is, however, usually taken as Passive in Mt 11<sup>12</sup> ('suffereth violence,' AV and RV; 'is gotten by force,' AVm; vim patitur, Vulg.; βιαίως κρατείται, Hesychius). The image may be taken from the storming of a city or from forcing an entrance through an opposing army: the word is used in Thucyd. Hist. vii. 70, 72, of the Athenian fleet forcing its way out of Syracuse (βιάζεσθαι τὸν ἐκπλουν), and in Xen. Hell. v. ii. 23, of cities forced into a union (πόλεις τὰς βεβιασμένας).

The further question now arises, From whom does the violence proceed? and three answers are possible: (1) from true disciples, (2) from other aspirants, (3) from enemies, e.g. the scribes and Pharisees. If the last be adopted, the meaning will then be, 'the kingdom of heaven is violently resisted, is crushed, and violent men tear it to pieces.' So Dalman explains the passage (see below), and similarly Hilgenfeld in Mt. ('is violently crushed'), but he would render in Lk. 'every man is constrained by the gospel,' taking βάζεται as Passive). This, however, is partly an anachronism, for the imprisonment of John hardly justifies such strong language, and is partly forbidden by the connexion with v.¹3 and with what goes before (see Meyer's note). 'Non est h. l. querela de vi mala, nam querela incipit versu 16' (Bengel). 'The subject is not the resistance made to the kingdom of heaven, but the difference between a prophesied and a present kingdom of heaven' (Alford). The second answer is based on the supposition that Jesus here meant to rebuke a wrong method, not to commend a right one, and expressed disapproval of the violence of those who, misled by the free invitations of the gospel, were inclined to force an entrance, disregarding the requirements of the Law. In its favour it may be urged that this explanation admirably suits the difficult context of Lk 16¹s and the use of πâs, 'every man entereth violently into it.' Jesus shows in v.¹t¹t that 'the same orderly methods were to obtain in the Kingdom as under the Law; so much so that the Law itself might be said to be maintained in every detail. The Gospel was not a release from, but a deepening and widening and spiritualizing of the Law's requirements' (Canon Bindley, who advocates this view in a paper entitled 'The Method of the Christ,' Expos.

The first answer, however, is preferred by most commentators, viz. that the Biagral are the disciples who seek a share in the Heavenly Kingdom with ardent zeal and intensest exertions, strive to obtain its privileges with the utmost eagerness and effort' (Grimm-Thayer), 'men of violence' (RV; there is no art. in the Greek), 'violent men' (Wycl.), 'they that go to it with violence' (Tind.), 'the violent' (AV, Cran., Gen., Rhem.), πάντες of μετά σπουδής προσιόντες (Chrys.). Like the publicans and sinners, like Zacchæus, they take the Kingdom by force, they drag it to themselves (ἀρπάζουσι, cf. Jn 615), they clutch at it like spoils and make it their own, 'ut raptim, celerrima vi, perruptis obstaculis, ad se redigant bonum in medio positum' (Bengel). This explanation agrees best with Pindar's use of the similar word βιατάς, which has always a good sense (Meyer), 'mighty, strong, and closely corresponds to Luke's πār eis aὐτὴν βιάζεται, 'entereth violently into it' (RV), 'vi ingruit pia' (Bengel); 'presseth into it' (AV) is too weak. The hindrances are like a hostile army round a city which must be broken through with force; the same strenuous effort is required which is commanded in such passages as 'strive (ἀγωνίζεσθε) to enter in by the narrow door' (Lk 13<sup>24</sup>), 'ask, seek, and knock' (Mt 7<sup>7</sup>), 'fight the good fight of the faith' (ἀγωνίζου, 1 Ti 6<sup>12</sup>), 'so run that ye may attain' (1 Co 9<sup>24</sup>), 'contend earnestly for the faith' (ἐπαγωνίζεσθα, Jude's). 'Every man' (πâs) is perhaps emphatic, showing that the Pharicass and the scribes must no longer look on the sees and the scribes must no longer look on the Kingdom as the exclusive possession of their nation or class; it was open to all nations, and might be entered by even the lowest men, though it would appear from the warning of the following verses that not all would seek it in the right spirit. 'Jesus uses this strong figurative expression of violence and seizure, which in their peculiar meaning were applied to the unjust, forcible appropriation of others' goods, not because He finds the point of analogy in the injustice and violence, as if men could appropriate a share in the Kingdom of God in opposition to the Divine will, but because He sought to lay stress upon the necessity of urgent energetic laying hold of a good to which they can make no claim. It is of no avail in regard to the Kingdom of God to wait idly, as in other cases men may take a waiting attitude in regard to a gift; nor does it avail to seek laboriously to earn it: but it does avail energetically to lay hold of and to retain it. It is ready as a gift of God for men, but men must direct their desire and will towards it' (Wendt, The Teaching of Jesus, ii. 49, Eng. tr.). It is possible, however, to take the words as a description rather than as a commendation of the disciples, and to find in them a reference to those earthly ideas of the Messianic Kingdom which even the Apostles held until the day of the Assension (cf. Ac 1°).

Dalman (The Words of Jesus, pp. 139-143, Eng. tr.) in an important section, the substance of which is here transcribed, seeks to find the probable Aramaic antecedent of βιάζεναι. A. Meyer suggests [DD, cf. Dn 718. 22] but this would mean merely 'to take possession of,' and would hardly cause one writing in Greek to use βιάζενα. He finds a better equivalent in ηDR, which means in Peal 'to bo strong,' in Aphel 'to hold fast'; in Dt 2225, Onkelos has ηDP, for Heb. P'ΠΡη, while the LXX renders by βιακάμενε. It is important to remember that ηDR has no Passive; from this it would follow that the Passive βιάζεναι is not derived immediately from an Aramaic prototype. A solution more in conformity with the Greek may be arrived at provided DJR be made the starting-point, for it can mean 'to use force' and 'to rob.' The text (Mt 1112) thus refers to that period of the theocracy (i.e. the Kingdom of God) which was introduced by the imprisonment of John the Baptist; it is its peculiarity that the theocracy suffers violence, not, of course, from believers, but from those in authority. The words ἀρκάζενετι κίντιν (κητομα) are not intended to suggest that the violent seize the theocracy, but merely that they maltreat it in the persons of its representatives. The utterance occurs in St. Luke in an entirely different connexion. According to him, it is applied in opposition to the Pharisees, who despised the admonition as to the right use of money. Jesus declared to them that the proclamation of the theocracy since the time of John made it possible for any one to intrude himself violently into it; nevertheless it was not their own estimate, but the judgment of God that decided who was worthy of entrance. The context, however, in Lk. may be pronouncefully if DJR is used.

If it be supposed, adds Dalman, that by using (vv. 15-18) sayings of our Lord which originally had quite a different association, Lk. obtains the transition to a new parable, it may be surmised that he has given to v. 16 its present form to accommodate it to the context. The saying which Mt. and Lk. found in their sources made mention only of the violent treatment of the theorracy since the time of John. St. Luke thought of attempted entrance into it, and thus found it natural to insert it here. St. Matthew, with greater reason, understood it to refer to the violent treatment of the preachers of the theocracy, and therefore connected it with the answer of Jesus to John. Neither by Jesus nor by the Evangelists is it suggested that any one could actually appropriate the theocracy by force. Unless absolutely driven to it, we ought not to try to discover beneath these words an idea so distinctly at variance with the whole style of our Lord's teaching.

YIRGIN BIRTH.—Introductory.—A cursory examination of the Gospel narratives is sufficient to reveal certain apparent inconsistencies of statement and implication regarding the parentage of Jesus. He is popularly regarded and spoken of as the son of Joseph (cf. Mt 13<sup>35</sup> 'Is not this the carpenter's son?' Lk 4<sup>22</sup>, Jn 1<sup>45</sup> 6<sup>42</sup>); and even in the Nativity narrative of the Third Gospel, Mary and Joseph reseveral times referred to as "his parents" (yeselt, Lk 2<sup>n. (t. 0</sup>), while once the mother of Jesus her-self is made to say, 'Thy father (i.e. Joseph) and I sought thee sorrowing '(2<sup>n</sup>). It is quite clear that Jesus was popularly looked upon by His contem-porarios as Joseph's son by natural generation. On the other hand, both the First and the Third tiospels contain special sections dealing with the sircumstances of the birth of Jesus in detail, and, though obviously independent, the two traditions embodied in the Nativity narratives agree in stating unequivocally that James was born of a virgin mother without the intervention of a human father (Mt. 1 st., Lk. 1 st. st).

No real inconsistency is, however, necessarily involved in the marratives as they stand. The secret of Jesus' birth may have been for long jealously guarded within the narrow circle among jealously guarded within the narrow circle among whom it was originally known. It apparently formed no part of the early Apostolic tasching and pranching, and was not included in the common form of the Synoptic Gospel-tradition (note that the Second Gospel begins with the Baptism). In preserving, therefore, the popular retorences to Jesus as Joseph's son, the First and Third Gospels conform to reverbological and heateric truth. In conform to psychological and historic truth. In one part of the narrative, popular opinion is accu-rately reflected and expressed; in the other, know-ledge of a special character derived from private

That no hammisterny was felt to exist in this deutile two of description appears from the fact that it occurs even in the Appearyphal Cospein, where the virginity of the mother of Jesus is often tasked upon with unrecommy stress. Thus is the Cospei of parado Ratther (ch. 27) the fullowing, e.g., occurs "And some went away to the chiat priests, and to the chiats of the Phorisum, and taid them that Jesus the ten of Jesuph had dense great signs," etc. A lew pages further on (ch. 20) Jesus is funde to my "But I am an alien is your courts, because I have no careal parent." On the other hand, if such retended consistency in describing Jesus as those cited above from the Gospale had exhibited a mechanical consistency in describing Jesus as the flux of litry (in the entire exclusion of Jesuph), the representation would have justly been impagned as violating the canous of historical and psychological truth.

To occial hife and one a more her of the deviation.

In social life and as a member of the Jewish nation, Jeous, during His earthly life, would neceshas pointed out, 'If no other fatherhood was alleged, then the child must have been regarded as bestowed by God upon the house of Joseph'; and stowed by God upon the house of Joseph'; and while Joseph was alive, Mary and her non were undoubtedly under his legal protection. This consideration will help to explain the fact that both genealogies trace the Davidie descent of Joseph through Joseph (not through Mary). On any view Jesus belonged to the family of Joseph; and if any formal and official birth-register ever had any independent existence in the Temple or elsewhere, Jesus would naturally annear therein as Joseph's Jesus would naturally appear therein as Joseph's

The genealogy is Mt. 1 in movining like its present form can hardly have formed part of such a document. Special diductio features are too pressumed in t. ? Reparting the test of Mt. 110 one up. Randar, art. ? Jeans Chetx' in Hastinger DB (tl. 644 f.). On the other hand, the genealogy in the Third Gospel (Lk 355.20) has a greater appearance of independence, and may have been incorporated by the Evangelist from a written source (cf. Standay sp. st. 645).

It would be strange, indeed, if the writer of the Fourth Gospel possessed no knowledge of the tradition of the virgin birth of Jesus as embodied in Mt 1-2 and Lk 1-2. Silence in this case would presumably imply not ignorance, but tacit accept-ance. Unless the tradition were contradicted either explicitly or tacitly, the presumption in such a case is that it was accepted. It is certainly signi-ficant that the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, which occupies a similar place to that of the geneslogy in the First Gospel, traces the origin of the Logos, which became incarnate in Christ, to the nner life of God. What the genealogies attempted to do partially is here carried out fundamentally and finally. The question arises, Is the Prologue numbered to be a facit correction of the Matthean and Lukan Nativity traditions? Or are those—at any rate as regards their central feature—the rirgin burth—alently accepted and supplemented by the statement of fuller and deeper truth? The atter alternative accords with the characteristic manner and method of the Fourth Evangelist. So far from excluding the possibility of the virgin birth, it may be argued that the Prologue presupposes it. In view of the fact that the tradition of the virgin birth must already have been current in certain Christian circles, and can hardly have been anknown to the writer of the Johannine Prologue, this conclusion becomes at least highly pro-bable. If the writer had conceived of the method of the Incarnation of the pre-existent Logos as being otherwise, we should at least have expected to find some hint or suggestion to that effect. to and some fint or suggestion to that effect. In the only varsa, however, in the Prologue where any allusion to birth occurs (Ja 118), the refer-ence is certainly not incompatible with the tradi-tion of the virgin birth, but may be regarded as lending it, if anything, some presumptive support.

This conclusion is reinforced if the contention of Carr (Exp? rviii. With regard to the alloyed situace of 3t. Paul, it is by so means clear that sitesce in this case any more than in that findirect allusions to the virgin birth are actively abount in the Pauline Epistles (cf. Gal. 44 's here of the virgin birth.

1. The Gaspal sources. — The question really narrows itself down to one concerning the amount of credibility that is to be attached to the Gaspal narratives of the Nativity contained in Mt 1-2 and Lk 1-2. This is not the place to enter into a full discussion of these narratives as a whole, or to repeat what has already been said on the subject in the art. Brath of Chest in this work. But in the art. Britth Of Christ in this work that one or two points of special significance in this connexion may be dealt with. Recent critical dis-cussion has largely been concerned with these narratives, around which the critical battle has fiercely raged. In the result it may be said with confidence (a) that the Palestinian character and origin of the narratives have been firmly estab-lished, and (b) that the attempt to disintegrate the Lukan account has not been attended with signal

(n) The establishment of the Palestinian origin and character of the two Birth narratives carries with it important consequences. The narratives have been shown to be Jewish Christian through and through. It follows that the tradition of the virgin birth gained currency among Christian circles in Palentine at a relatively early date, probably by the middle of the 1st century." A further inference is that we must look for the origin of this tradition 'on Palestinian soil at sufficiently early a date to account for its presence in two quite independent forms in the Pirst and Third trospels. That being so, the view that they are laised upon actual facts and came ultimately from the family of Christ Himself, is infinitely probable.'

(b) Ceitical abjections have been raised to the integrity of the Lukun Birth narrative. In Ek 2, it is urged, the view of the narrative is that Mary is traced, the view of the narrative is that Mary was Joseph's wife, and that he was the father of Jesus (cf. 2<sup>20</sup> this father and his mother,' v. 4 this parents,' v. 4 'thy father and I ); the Davidic pachgree of Jesus is traced through Joseph, with the harmonistic explanation as was supposed (32); and with this agrees the early reading apparently preserved in the Smaitic Syriac, 25, "with Mary his wife." The narrative in ch. 1 could be harmonized with that in ch. 2 if vv. 46.25 -which contain 'the only reference to the virgin birth in the Third Gospel' could be removed as an interpolation. This procedure—which has the support of such scholars (among others) as Harnack, Holtzmann, Pfleiderer, Schmiedel, and Usener -is justified on the following grounds:

The reference to Elasheth in v <sup>26</sup> certainly seems to follow botter on v <sup>28</sup>. In that passage, moreover, the child whose both is announced in already designated Messianically as <sup>28</sup> on of the Most High'; but the title <sup>28</sup> non of God' in v <sup>28</sup>. In a squite inferent signification, it denotes not official adoption, but actual origin v <sup>28</sup> is thus a doublet of vv <sup>28</sup>. <sup>28</sup> on another plane. Moreover, the incredulity of Mary concerning the possibility of motherhood (v <sup>28</sup>) seems inexplicable in one already betrothed, vet it does not (like that of Zacharias, vv <sup>28</sup>. <sup>29</sup>) expose her to rebute or penalty; the doubt seems introduced only to give occasion for the explanation in v.<sup>20</sup>. The real reply of Mary to the original autonoccament in vv <sup>28</sup>. <sup>28</sup> follows in v <sup>28</sup> the it into me according to thy word, and her submission to the heavenly will wise the blessing of Elimbeth (v. <sup>23</sup>), §

A closer examination of the suspected verses thes not, however, lend any support to the theory of interpolation. Their phraseology is unmistak ably Hebraistic in character, the language being suggested by and derived from the OT. In fact, as Professor Briggs has pointed out, "the Annunciation represents the conception of Jesus as due to a theophany.'|| The verses are of the same character as the rest of the narrative, and must be the work of a Jewish writer; and there is every reason to believe, with Gunkel, that they are translated from a Hebrew original. This consideration will help to elucidate the meaning of the announcement in v.31 more closely. The Hebrew original of  $\sigma(\lambda)\eta/\eta$  there would be a participle." and the exact rendering would be, Behold, thou art conterring now.' In immediate conception is meant, not one that would naturally follow after Joseph had in the course taken her to wife; and this immediate conception is implied by the words with haste in v. ... Besides, v. ... ("And behold, Elisabeth, thy kinswoman, she also hath conceived a son in her old age ') implies that a conception of an extraordinary character has been mentioned in the previous verses in reference to Mary; and the words suggest that a not unnatural doubt and with suggest that a not uniature doubt and surprise on her part are being set at rest (cf. esp. v<sup>n</sup> for no word of tool shall be impossible). There would be nothing extraordinary in Mary's concerning a son as Joseph's wife.

Again, the Lukan genealogy, far from dis-crediting, seems to the present writer to offer a positive argument for the authenticity of the suspected verses. Jewish genealogies usually have some edifying purpose in view, and the list in Lk 3 nems to be no exception to the rule. The striking feature about it is that it traces the descent of Jesus right up to Adam (Ar son) of God. Evidently, in linking Adam to Christ, the editor or compiler intends to suggest that Christ is the Second Adam, the re-founder of the human race, and that just as the first Adam was son of God by a direct creative act, so also was the Second (by the power of the Holy Spirit). For genealogical purposes it was necessary to link Jesus to previous generations through His foster-father Joseph. But the suggestion is that the Second Adam, like the inst, owes His human existence to a direct creative act on the part of God. Lk 3<sup>20</sup> thus supports the genuineness of 1<sup>20</sup> (vior θcol), and the whole genealogy, viewed in the light of its edifying purpose, guarantees the original character of the alleged interpolation.

The fact that sees fleet in the genealogy involves the occurrence of sees in the physical sense of origin exactly as in 126, has an important bearing on the objection noted above, viz. that while in v 32 (*80n of the Most High') 'son' denotes official adoption, in v.25 it describes actual origin.* But the two ideas are not mutually exclusive. At the mine time, it is difficult to see what can have suggested such an otherwise un-fewish application of the term 'son' in such a context, and aim'd language so Hebraistic, accept the actual occurrence of the fact narrated.

But the theory of interpolation is confronted with a further radical difficulty. It is not enough to remove the suspected verses to make the narrative congruous with a non-miraculous birth. The significant fact still remains that the figure of Joseph is quite subordinated in the Lukan account, while that of Mary is proportionately enhanced in lonely importance. This feature dominates the whole structure of Luke's first two chapters; and in this particular a sharp (and obviously designed) contrast is suggested between the nativity of John the Baptist and that of Jesus. While in the case of the Baptist's birth the annunciation is made to the father (1<sup>1st</sup>), in that of Jesus it is made to the mother (1<sup>2st</sup>); and while the Baptist's birth is represented as the occasion of such profound joy on the part of Zacharias that the latter's dumbness is overcome, and he bursts into the strains of the bursts into the strains of the Burdetus (1987), no such rôle is assumed to Joseph. What reason can be adduced for this deliberate minimizing of the part assigned to Joseph a feature that characterizes the Lukan narrative throughout—except it be that the fundamental fact, dominating and forming the fundamental fact, dominating and forming the climax of the whole, is the miraculous birth of Jesus of a virgin mother?† [Cf. also the criticism of this theory of interpolation in the art. BIRTH OF CHRIST, vol. i. p. 203].

(c) The Matthern account of the virgin birth (Mt 114 2) has already been discussed in the art. cited above (vol. i. p. 206). Here it will be necessary to emphasize only one or two special points. The intensely Jewish character of the narrative, its sobriety and delicacy, have been justly insisted upon. It is difficult to trace in so restrained a narrative the 'pagan substratum' of justly insisted upon. It is difficult to trace in so restrained a narrative the 'pagan substratum' of which Usener speaks. The full blown myth has certainly been divested of all its bloom. In fact, the points of difference far outnumber the resemblances with the ancient myth, as even Cheyne admits (Bible Problems, p. 89 i.). In this connexion the difficult problem arises as to the real significance of the quotation in Mt. of Is 714 (LXX): 'Behold, the riegin in maphinos) shall conceive and hear a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel' Two points are clear (1) No trace exists in Jewish (as distinct from Christian) literature known to us of any Messianic application of this text; nor is it possible to adduce any indubitable evidence from Jewish sources that the belief in the Messiah's being born of a virgin was ever current among the Jews. (2) It is generally agreed among critical scholars that the narrative of Mt. could not have been suggested by the quotation (Is 714), but that the quotation was, in accordance with his usual method, added by the narrator as a proofpassage from Scripture in support of the story.

It is, however, difficult to account for the LXX rendering (****aphiss**). It may, perhaps, have been adopted under the influence of 'current mythological ideas' in order to enhance the mysteriousness of the future Deliverer's origin, or it may be It is, however, difficult to account for the LXX rendering (\( \text{rendering}\). It may, perhaps, have been adopted under the influence of 'current mythological ideas' in order to enhance the mysteriousness of the future Deliverer's origin, or it may be due simply to the fact that the translators regarded \( \text{-raphine}\) is as being the true Greek equivalent of \( \text{-raphine}\), without consciously giving it any definite reference to the Messiah. If, as Gunkel supposes, Messiah's birth of a virgin had become a fixed element in Jewish Christological belief before the birth of Jesus, which was afterwards transferred in Jewish-Christian legend to our Lord's nativity, how is it that no trace of such a belief has survived in Jewish literature? Why the reluctance and reserve manifested in proclaiming the alleged fact, if such a birth had come to be regarded as one of the distinguishing marks of the true Messiah? But so far from its being a popular or even familiar belief among the Jews, it may be inferred with practical certainty from Mt.'s narrative that the story of the virgin birth was to Jewish readers a stumbling-block, which it required special apologatic efforts to overcome. Not improbably Jewish calumny regarding Jesus' birth had already made itself felt before Mt.'s narrative was published. The reference of Is 715 to the circumstances of Jesus' birth can, therefore, only have been suggested by the event, or, at least, by what the narrator looked upon as the actual facts. Consequently the Messianic application is purely Jewish-Christian. In Justin Marty (Dial. c. Tryph. Ixili.) there is a curiously interesting collection of proof-passages from Scripture in support of the virgin birth: viz. besides is 714, also 536' (Who shall declare his generation?), Gn 4911, Ps 1103' (in the beauties of thy saints, from the womb have I begotten thee before the morning star': so LXX). In the last passage the LXX clearly interprets of the pre-existent Messiah: 'the application to the virgin birth of Messiah would s

It is important to remember that the Nativity narrative of the First Gospel is governed by an apologetic and (partly) polemical purpose. The compiler is meeting Jewish objections and (probably) Jewish calumny, which finds its explanation in a distorted version of the virgin birth. The prominence of Joseph is also noticeable. This may also, perhaps, be due to the compiler's desire to meet Jewish calumny. It was important to show what exactly Joseph's relations were to his espoused wife, to make clear that Mary and her child enjoyed his protection, in order to meet Lawish slander. Another motive too may have Jewish slander. Another motive, too, may have been at work. The Jews were at no time disposed to exalt the unmarried state above the married. The story of the Virgin, with Joseph completely subordinated, might easily lead to such a result, which, from the strict Jewish point of view, it was important to avoid.

2. The sources of the two Nativity narratives. The present writer's conclusion, arrived at in-dependently, closely approximates to that of Professor Briggs, who points out that the material of which the 'Gospel of the Infancy' is composed is in the form of poetry embedded in prose narrative. This poetry is of the same kind as the poetry of the Old Testament. It was translated from Hebrew originals, and in its Greek form embodied by St. Luke in his opening chapters. It is probable that the prose which encompasses this poetry comes from the authors of the Gospels, the poetry from other and probably several different authors. Therefore we are not to look for an earlier written Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus, but are to think of a number of early Christian poems with reference to that infancy from which the author of our Gospel [St. Luke] made a selection. . . These songs which have been selected for use in the Gospel of Luke doubtless represent reflexion upon these events by Christian poets who put in the mouths of the angels, the mothers and the fathers, the poems which they composed. But the inspired author of the Gospel vouches for their propriety and for their essential conformity to truth and fact.'+ In the Matthæan narrative the annunciation to Joseph (Mt 1<sup>20, 21</sup>) is probably a citation from one of these Hebrew hymns, which has been translated into Greek. All the hymns were, perhaps, composed for liturgical use, and were so used in the early Jewish-Christian community in Palestine. As we have seen, they will probably have been in existence at least as early as the middle of the 1st cent. A.D. Their whole tone so intensely Jewish and Messianic, but yet so spiritual—and their primitive Christology suggest early conditions. Their authority must therefore rank exceedingly high. It has often been re-marked that the narrative in the First Gospel is written from the standpoint of Joseph, that in the Third from the point of view of Mary. The delicacy of feeling, the exquisite reserve, the intimate touches which mark each narrative, well accord with this conclusion. Sanday's conjecture, that the Lukan material is based upon a tradition derived from the mother of Jesus through one of the women mentioned in Lk 8<sup>3</sup> 24<sup>10</sup>, is a suggestive and valuable one.

3. Heathen analogies.—As early as the time of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. lxvii.), the mythological tales of virgin birth were cited to discredit the Christian doctrine. 'Amongst the Grecian fables,' says Trypho, 'it is asserted that Perseus was born of the virgin Danae; Jupiter, as they call him, coming down upon her in a shower of gold. Such tales are widespread. 'We can no longer ignore the fact,' says Mr. Estlin Carpenter, 'that the idea of a wondrous birth without human fatherhood appears in a multitude of tales which can be traced literally round the world "from China to Peru." ‡ A large collection of these has been made in Hartland's Legend of Perseus. But for purposes of comparison here the great majority of them can be dismissed. The Greek fables, which impute the physical origin of great men (heroes and benefactors) to the gods (not only to Zeus, but to Apollo, Mars, Mercury), doubtless are the expression of popular feeling which finds in splendid endowments and achievements something marvellous and inexplicable on natural grounds.

*The poetical pieces are not confined to the 'Canticles' usually recognized, but include the words of the Annunciation (Lk 128. 20:33. 25:57) as well as other pieces.
† Briggs, Messiah of the Gospels, p. 42 ff.
† Op. cit. p. 490.

soil for such beliefs in the popular feeling and consciousness was a fertile one. But this was not the case among the Jews. Such feeling assumed quite a different form among them, at any rate within historical times. It is difficult to see how ideas of the kind prevalent in the pagan popular consciousness regarding the sons of the gods could have found an entrance into primitive Christian circles—least of all Jewish Christian circles. To borrow Dr. Weiss' words, 'The shameless glorifying of sensual desire in these myths could only provoke in the primitive Christian consciousness the deepest abhorrence; every endeavour to refer any such idea to Jesus must have appeared a profanation of what was most holy, by thus dragging it through the mire of sensuality.'* Cheyne, indeed, following Gunkel, has made out a stronger case for the introduction of mythical material regarding the mother of the Messiah from Baby-lonian sources (cf. Bible Problems, p. 76 f.). As has already been pointed out, the 'woman clothed with the sun' of Rev 12 is clearly mythological. And she was regarded by the author of the chapter as being the mother of the Messiah.

Now it is undoubtedly true that the Jewish Messianic idea bears traces of the influence of the universal myth of the World Redeemer. It is indeed, when analyzed critically, found to be largely a transformed and refined edition of the old material. The universal craving which found varying expression in the world-myth of the coming Deliverer assumed its highest and most spiritual phase in some forms of Jewish Messianic belief. One feature of the myth was the representation of the mother of the coming Deliverer. The mother the mother of the coming Deliverer. The mother plays an important rôle, but no father is mentioned. Here in all probability we must see a survival of the idea of the goddess-mother as distinct from the later one of the goddess-wife.† In Is 714 the goddess-mother has been transferred to earth, and has become simply the Israelitish woman who is to bear the wonderful child.

In Rabbinical literature this idea seems to have survived in the various forms in which the conception of the Messiah's earthly pre-existence comes to expression.

(1) He is represented as leading a hidden life and then suddenly manifests himself (cf. Mt 247. 43. 44). In the Midrash Ex. Rabba, l., it is said that as Moses, the first deliverer, was reared at the court of Pharsoh, so the future Deliverer will grow up in the Roman capital. Another Midrash Exys that the Messiah will suddenly be revealed to Israel in Rome.

(2) The Messiah is represented as born, but not yet revealed.? Cf. the well-known passage Sanh. 98b, where R. Joshua b. Levi is quoted as saying that the Messiah is already born and is living in concealment at the gates of Rome. According to the Targ. (Jerus.) on Mic. 43, the Messiah is on the earth, but is still in concealment because of the sins of the people.

(3) The Messiah is represented as having been born at some time in the past (according to one account, born at Bethlehem on the day to f king David and now dwelling at Rome). In the curious story of the Messiah's birth quoted by Lightfoot (Horæ, on Mt 21), the birth of the Messiah (whose name is Menahem, son of Hezekiah) is connected with Bethlehem and the destruction of the Temple. His mother's name is not given, she being described simply as 'the mother of Menahem.' At Bethlehem she is found with her infant son by the Jew who has been mysteriously apprised of Messiah's birth. The Jew leaves, and 'after some days returns to that city, and says to her, "How does the little infant?" And she said: "From the time you saw me last spirits and tempests came, and snatched him away out of my hands."

In all these forms of the myth it is to be observed that the mother of the Redeemer is nowhere called a 'virgin.' Where the mention of a father does not occur, this feature may be due to the prominence of the mother in an earlier social stage, surviving in the form of the goddess-mother; an idea which later assumed the form of the Messiah's being concealed and unknown, and manifesting Himself suddenly. It is also to be observed that in Rev 12 the woman is a heavenly being: in other words, the conception in this passage is nearer the primitive myth than it is in Is 714. It is difficult to imagine how the representation in Rev 12 can have suggested the idea of the virgin birth, though it is easy to see that the prominence assigned to the virgin mother of Jesus in the Christian story may have influenced the author of Revelation in selecting so crude a piece of mythological material for the purposes of his book. In other words, it was the Gospel story that suggested the selection of the mythical representation in Rev 12. It would be easier to suppose that the LXX of Is 7<sup>14</sup> had given rise to the story of the virgin birth than the mythical figure in Revelation.

In order to overcome this difficulty, Professor Cheyne is driven to conjecture 'that in some of the early Jewish versions of the Oriental myth of the Divine Redeemer (which has not, so far as we know as yet, been preserved) the mother of the Holy Child was called a "virgin" (Bible Problems, p. 81). And, further, it is necessary to suppose that παρθένος ('virgin'), which in its original application (e.g. to the great mother-goddess of Asia Minor) meant one who was not bound by the marriage tie (and therefore connoted anything but the virginity of Lk 134), in the process of transition to the conjectured Jewish version of the myth, lost its original connotation, and was interpreted in the strict sense; 'for nothing is easier than for Divine titles to pass from one religion to another, and for their original meaning to be forgotten' (ib.). This, however, is hardly a plausible explanation of the idea of virgin birth in its various heathen forms. Some at least of these inherently possessed a high religious value (cf. the Egyptian examples cited by J. Estlin Carpenter, op. cit. p. 491f.). On the whole question, some weighty words of Professor Sanday may well be pondered. 'If we believe On the that the course of human ideas, however mixed in their character—as all human things are mixed is yet part of a single development, and that development presided over by a Providence which at once imparts to it unity and prescribes its goal, —those who believe this may well see in the fantastic outgrowth of myth and legend something not wholly undesigned or wholly unconnected with the Great Event which was to be, but rather a dim unconscious preparation for that Event, a groping towards it of the human spirit, a prophetic instinct gradually moulding the forms of thought in which it was to find expression' (op. cit. p. 647).

It is, however, all-important to remember that the Gospel narratives belong to the sphere of history, and were produced under the limitations that condition the record of historic facts. creations of the mythopoic fancy flourish in a different atmosphere. 'They are part of a common stock of imaginative material reproduced without purpose or authority from age to age and land to land, destitute of historic significance.

4. Results of the discussion.—Is the Gospel story of the virgin birth a legend? If so, it must have grown up within the Jewish-Christian community of Palestine, and must represent a primitive Christological dogma expressing the idea of the perfect moral and spiritual purity of Jesus as Son of God. The Christian consciousness, it might be urged, working on such a passage as 'Thou art my Son, this day I have begotten thee' (Ps 27), together with the Scripture promise of the fulness of the Spirit that should rest upon the Messiah (Is 112), may have been led to transfer these ideas to the physical beginnings of Jesus' life.* absence of any analogous developments in the Christian consciousness elsewhere, this is hard to believe. Why did the Christological process assume just this form, and in this (a priori most unlikely) quarter? The impulse must have been given from But the hypothesis that it was imported from heathen sources into so strictly Jewish a circle is incredible; consequently it must have grown out of a conviction, cherished originally within a limited Palestinian circle of believers, that the traditional belief among them was based upon facts, of which some members of that com-munity had been the original depositaries and

When subjected to the criteria properly applicable to it, such a tradition would seem to possess high claims to historical credibility. The restrained character of both narratives of the virgin birth, the verisimilitude of small details, the reserve that characterizes them, their very inconsistencies, argue against the hypothesis of invention or of their being mere mythical figments. And these characteristics distinguish them as much from the apocryphal Christian versions as from heathen myths. Everything, indeed, suggests their 'essential conformity to truth and fact.' The essential truth embodied in the Christian tradition has been admirably stated by Professor Briggs: †

"The virgin conception of Jesus . . . Is not to be interpreted as if it were a miracle in violation of the laws of nature, but rather as brought about by God Himself present in theophany. The conception of Jesus in the womb of the Virgin Mary differs from all other conceptions of children by their mothers, in that there was no human father. The place of the human father was taken by God Himself; not that God appeared in theophany in human form to beget the child, after the analogy of the mythologies of the ethnic religions, but that God in a theophany in an extraordinary way, unrevealed to us, and without violation of the laws of maternity, impregnates the Virgin Mary with the holy seed. The words of the angel imply a theophanic presence; for though it might be urged that the coming of the Spirit upon her was an invisible coming, after the analogy of many passages of the Old Testament, yet the parallel statement that the Divine power covered her with a shadow, but this is to be thought of, after the uniform usage of Scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of Scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of Scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of Scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of Scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of glory, after the uniform usage of scripture, as a bright cloud of planting and the comment when the Divine energy enabled her to conceive the child Jesus.'

The evidence suggests that the secret of Jesus' birth was not at first generally made known. doctrine of the Virgin Birth was not generally revealed in the earlier part of the Apostolic Age.' Mr. Arthur Wright (Synopsis<sup>2</sup>, p. xlii) believes it 'to have been kept back until conflict with heresy brought it forward.' This is not improbable. It has already been pointed out above that in all probability one strong motive at work in the Matthæan account was to meet Jewish calumny regarding Jesus' birth. If this view is correct, the Matthæan narrative must have been composed later than the Lukan, which shows no such strong interest, and contains more original material.

5. Meaning of the virgin birth.—If we assume, then, that the virgin birth is a fact, in accordance with the conclusions reached above, we have further to ask, What is the meaning of the fact? In the Lukan account the birth is already invested with a Christological significance. Jesus is Son of God, because He is begotten in the womb of the Virgin by the Divine energy. This represents an early stage in Christological development. In St. Mark the Divine Sonship of Jesus is connected with the Baptism (1<sup>11</sup>); in St. Luke (1<sup>24, 25</sup>), with the supernatural birth; in St. Paul, with the Resurrection; in St. John (Prologue to the Fourth Gospel), with the essential and eternal relationship subsisting between the Father and the Son.

*This is substantially the position taken up by Lobstein in the Essay on The Virgin Birth of Christ (Eng. tr., Williams & Norgate, 1903). Lobstein contends that 'the conception of the miraculous birth of Christ is the fruit of religious feeling, the echo of Christian experience, the poetic and popular expression of an affirmation of faith' (p. 96). He also denies pagan influence, and maintains that the conception 'has its roots deep down in Israel's religion transformed by the new faith' (p. 76, cf. p. 69 f.).

But the central and abiding significance of the fact consists in the expression it affords of the perfect moral and spiritual purity of Jesus. It proclaims the entrance into the world of a sinless manhood, in which 'the sinful entail' has been broken. 'It involves the introduction of a new factor, to which the taint of sin does not attach. If like produces like, the element of unlikeness must come from that to which it has itself affinity. Our names for the process do but largely cover our ignorance, but we may be sure that there is essential truth contained in the scriptural phrase, "The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Most High shall overshadow thee; wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God." *

VIRTUE.—AV tr. in Mk 520, Lk 610 846 of δύναμις (RV 'power'), referring to the healing influence that went out from Jesus. On the early English use of the term see art. 'Virtue' in Hastings' DB.

YISION.—See DREAM.

YISITATION.—1. The ecclesiastical term applied to the visit of the Virgin Mary to Elisabeth three months before the birth of the Baptist (Lk 120-26), commemorated in Western Church Calendars on 2nd July.

2. Exercise (Lk 1944). Occurs only once in the Gospels, but is found also in Ac 120, where it = 'charge,' 'office,' 'bishopric' (AV); cf. 1 Ti 31, where it = 'oversight,' 'office of a bishop' (AV). where it='oversight,' office of a dishop (Av). It occurs in a sense more nearly approaching that of Lk 19<sup>44</sup> in 1 P 21<sup>2</sup>, where, however, 'the day of visitation' (ἡμέρα ἐπισκοπῆς) seems to imply trial and affliction, whereas in Lk 19<sup>44</sup> 'the time of visitation' (ὁ καιρός τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς) is suggestive rather of the special care and mercy of God, and the opportunity thereby afforded.

In classical Greek interest is found only in Lucian, interest being the usual form. In LXX 759, 7799 are rendered by interest interest, interest (On 5024.29, Ex 318 1319, Is 103 [4 interest interest, as in 1 P 212], Jet 1018 [anapie interest, as in Lk 1944], P8 84). In the Apocrypha the word is used in the sense of inspection or examination, though in Wis 1411 there is an implication of Divine wrath, derived, however, mainly from the context. In NT interestantens is used to signify visitation in sympathy or compassion (Mt 2538.43, Ja 137); God's gracious regard (Lk 188.716, Ac 1514, He 26); in the sense of 'going and seeing' (Ac 738); and to imply enquiry for the purpose of selection (Ac 65).

To the general use of ἐπισκέπτομαι, ἐπισκοπή, we may find a parallel in the use of the English word 'regard,' which, in addition to the sense of 'observation,' may imply also a kindly or gracious purpose. ἐπωκοπή may be said generally to signify critical inspection (by God), in which due regard is had to the good and bad features in the characters of the persons inspected. ἐπισκέπτομαι implies also a Divine purpose of blessing. [The technical use of ἐπισκοπή, indicated above, to denote the office of a bishop, is of course secondary]. Thus in Lk 19<sup>44</sup> we may understand the 'time of visitation' as being either the time during which Jerusalem was being critically regarded by God, and neglected, through ignorance of this inspection, to display those features of national character which would have redeemed it in God's eyes; or the time of appritual opportunity, afforded by the presence of God manifest in the flesh, in which it might have known and sought 'the things which belonged unto its peace.' In the latter sense, the 'time of visita-tion' would be equivalent to 'this thy day' in v. ". S. J. RAMSAY SIBBALD.

VOICE.-1. Introductory.-The Gr. word of which voice is a rendering in the NT is fourth. In the AV other renderings are cometimes given: as 'sound' (Jn 3") and 'noise' (Rev 6') [but cf. RV_where this inconsistency is generally removed *1. word is sometimes used of inarticulate utterance word is sometimes used of marticulate utterance (='sound'), e.g. of trumpet, Mt 24", I Co 14" ('things without life, giving a rosec, whether pipe or harp,' etc., AV 'sound' here), Rev 145 ('voice of many waters,' AV and RV), Jn 36 of the wind ('thou hearest the rosec thereof,' RV), etc.; sometimes of articulate utterance, ascribed to God (Mt 20") and articulate utterance, ascribed to God (Mt 317 etc.), and, naturally, to men (Mt 31 c.g.).

from is often used in such combinations as we posts when Gran, in: 'to lift up the color (e.g. Lk 1718 1187), with the general meaning 'to cry out,' 'call', φυνύ μεραλα,' with a great (load) color,' is often added to verbs, see the Lexx, and cf. art. Cxv.

The 'voice' of God and the 'voice' of Christ are referred to in various connexions (some eschatological). Jesus compares the call which He makes to that of the shephent to his sheep (Jn 10<sup>35</sup>) the sheep hear his core?; cf. 10<sup>14, 37</sup> 18<sup>37</sup>); in an eschatological counexion, Rev 3<sup>30</sup> ('Behold, I stand at the door and knock : if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and sup with him, and he with me'); of the resurrection cry, I Th 4<sup>16</sup> (the voice of the archangel awakening the dead; cf. Jn 5<sup>28</sup>, the voice of Christ awakening the spiritually dead). The voice of God is spoken of as admonishing in the OT Scriptures (Jn 5<sup>27</sup>, He 3<sup>7, 13</sup> 4<sup>7</sup>), and as 'shaking the earth' (He 12<sup>28</sup>).

An antithesia is drawn by Gr writers (esp. Plutarch) between two and $\lambda_{P} \times_i$ and this was afterwards transferred by the Pathers (Origen, Augustine) to John the Baptiet and Christ, 'the first claiming for himself no nore than to be "the rote of one cruing in the widerness (In 12), the other emphatically declared to be the Word which was with Gol and was tool (Jin 11).' See, further, Trench, $\lambda_T Synonyma, 6 \text{lxxxx} x, where Augustine's interesting disquisition on this contrast is summarized.

2. The Voice from Heaven.  $-(\sigma)$  In the NT-Avoice from heaven' is mentioned in the Synoptics (φωνή έκ των οίρανων), in the narrative of the Baptism ('And lo, a voice out of the heavens, saying. This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased'), and again in Mt 17° || in the narrative of the Transfiguration a 'voice out of the cloud' is spoken of (And behold, a voice out of the cloud, baying, etc. In both cases, as Dalman (Words of Jenus, p. 204) has pointed out, the mention of the heavens and the cloud is derived from the context, and both representations are due to the Evangelic narrative and not to the words of Jesus. In the Fourth Gospel one reference occurs, viz. in Jn 12<sup>28</sup> 'There came therefore a voice out of heaven, saying,' etc.; and it is mentioned several times in the Apocalypse (Rev 104 5 142 184 etc.) -in all these passages introducing a heavenly revelation.

(b) In Rabbinical interature—The 'Heaventy Voice' is frequently met with in Rabbinical literature under the designation Bath Kos ('daughter voice'). Here also it often introduces a Divine revelation. The light Kos was one of the means used by God for imparting a revelation. It was heard all through Ethical bines, and, in fact, oftenest during the classical period of Israel shintons before prophecy was extinguished and while the Holy Splitt was about up in its finess among the people (symbolized by the Temple). Thus at the death of Mosea a Bath Kol was heard maying. 'Fear thou not, Moses' I invest will care for thy burial.' (Deat R. on xxxiv.). But it also survived beyond the Biblical period, and was regarded as the only means of Divins revelation then operative (Rab. Sots, 485; Yorss, 90). In time, however, it fell into disrepute, owing, perhaps, to the amiduous way in which it came to be looked for and appealed to by certain teachers as a means of further revelations, and by the Rabbis of the 2nd cent. it was decided that 'no attention is to certain teachers as a means of further revelations, and by the Rabbis of the find cent. it was decided that 'no attention is to be paid to it when arrogating to decide against the moral conviction of the majority. The Torah is not in heaven. Its interpretation is left to the conscience of catholic larsel.'

A distinction must be drawn between the true Bath Kol.—the Heavenly Yoke which proceeded really and intractiously from God Hinnelf directly—and the secondary Bath Kol, which was merely in human citerance heard by some chance, to which was attributed the significance of a Divine intimation (Dalman). In the former of these senses the expression is used to denote audible speech, appealing to the fisculty of hearing, uttered by God Hinself.—Only, the Rabbis shrank from anying baidly, 'God said so and so,' and made use of the phrase. A Bath Kol came (or was given)' instead.—The phrase, like many others, is merely precautionary, nor has it any hypostatic agnificance. One striking fracture about the revelations conceyed by the Bath Kol is that these were usually expressed not in original words, but in some verse or mentence taken from the Hebrew OT or (in some cased) from the Apocryphal books. Thus it is said that when the Rabbishical authorities proposed to include King Solomon among the finally lost, a Bath Kol was beard asjing in the words of Job 34<sup>23</sup> 'Shall his recompense be as thou with, that thou refuses it. ''f

Cf Bousset, Ref. d. Just 2 p. 3024.
The attempt of Edersheim (LT) p. 2854) to discredit 'any real analogs' between the Bath Kol and the Voice from Heaven mentioned in the Gospels is onwarranted. His contention that the Bath Kol could not be represented as accompanying the descent of the Hols Spirit is shown by the facts adduced above to be baseless. On the contenty, it would only be natural to represent the revival of prophecy and the return in full power of the Holy Spirit as including also the mode of revenition expressed by the 'Daughter-Voice.' Only so would the scale of revelation be complete.

YOWS.—A vow (rotum, εύχή) is a promise made to God ('promissio Deo facta,' Thom. Aquin. II. ii. Q. 88] It is a perfectly natural, and indeed mevitable, expression of religious feeling wherever there is a conception of a personal God with whom men come into any kind of relationship. Thus yows form part of the great pre-Christian and non-Christian religious systems. They are of two kinds: (1) vows made in hope of receiving some desired good, or of delivery from some special danger; and (2) vows of devotion made in expectation of attaining closer relationship with God. the OT we have examples of (1) in Gn 2820.22, Jg 1130, 1 S 111. Such vows may involve the dedication to God of a person, an animal, a field, a house or other property. Accurate laws were made for the other property. Accurate laws were made for the regulating of such vows and the defining of persons competent to make them (Lv 27, Nu 30<sup>15</sup>.). Of (2) the Nazirite vow taken for life (Jg 16<sup>17</sup>) or for a fixed period (Nu 6<sup>13</sup>) is an example.

In our Lord's teaching there is only one mention of vows (Mt 15<sup>45</sup>. || Mk 7<sup>105</sup>.). Here He rebukes in the severest manner the making of vows which interfers with the simple and obvious duties of interfere with the simple and obvious duties of man to man, and, as may be gathered from the Rabbinical teaching on Corban, hypocritical vows which were not meant to be kept. He says nothing about the making and keeping of justifiable and proper vows. It is therefore in accordance with a of the rightness of making vows which underlies our Lord's rebuke of the Pharisaical abuse of them, that the Church subsequently imposed vows upon candidates for baptism. The baptismal vow is in candidates for baptism. The baptismal vow is in reality a dedication of the whole person to God, and is in harmony with the general spirit of the gospel as well as with the Apostolic teaching (Ro 5<sup>11</sup> 12<sup>1, 2</sup>, 1 Co 7<sup>16, 17</sup>). The various monastic vows were supposed to be analogous to the OT Nazirite vow, and were regarded as means of attaining specially close communion with God.

WAGES.—1. ὀψώνιον is the technical term for a soldier's pay, and occurs only in Lk 3<sup>14</sup>. 'From a root πεπ we get ἔψω, δψον, "cooked" meat, fish, etc., as contrasted with bread. Hence the compound ὀψώνιον (ώνέομαι, "to buy")=(1) provision money, ration money, or the rations in kind given to troops (2) In a more general sense, "wages"' (Sanday-Headlam on Ro 622). In the time of Julius Cæsar, a foot soldier received § of a denarius a day. This was increased by Augustus. John the Baptist bids the soldiers (probably those engaged in police duty connected with the customs) abstain from adding to their wages by extortion through violence, threats, or false accusations.

2.  $\mu\omega\theta$  is the ordinary term for wages, and is translated indifferently throughout the Gospels as 'wages,' 'reward,' 'hire.' The labourers in the parable hire themselves for a denarius a day (Mt  $20^8$ ). That was a fairly generous rate for such work (cf. To  $5^{14}$ ). The denarius was equivalent in money value to  $9\frac{1}{2}$ d., and in purchasing value to about 2s. (see artt. 'Money,' § 8, and [in Ext. Vol.] 'Wages' in Hastings' DB). The analogy of service and wages is freely used by Jesus in His teaching; but it is not so much the receipt of wages that rules the thought as the quarter whence they come. The labourer is always worthy of his hire, but what that will be depends 2. μισθός is the ordinary term for wages, and is quarter whence they come. The labourer is always worthy of his hire, but what that will be depends upon whether he is serving the world or God. The Pharisee is really the world's hireling, and receives his wages from it, viz. honour, consideration, power, wealth, and not from God, whom nominally he serves (Mt 6<sup>2.5.16</sup>). But those persecuted for righteousness' sake (Mt 5<sup>11</sup>), those whose religious obedience is unobtrusive and self-forgetting (6<sup>4.6.18</sup>), those who help any of God's servents and do those who help any of God's servants and do them a kindness for His sake (10<sup>41.42</sup>, Mk 9<sup>41</sup>), those who go beyond the world's self-regarding way, and love their enemies, and do good and lend, hoping for nothing again (Lk 625, Mt 545.46), are servants of the unseen Father. Their wages are receive the Father's open acknowledgment and gather fruit unto life eternal (Mt 6<sup>4,6,18</sup>, Jn 4<sup>36</sup>).

Jesus' remark that the labourer is worthy of his hire, or of his meat (Lk 107, cf. Mt 1010), probably a quotation of a common proverb, is of a different order. It is an encouragement to His disciples to accept hospitality, in their missionary journeys, from those to whom they have ministered in spiritual enlightenment.

WAGGING.—See GESTURES in vol. i. p. 646b.

WAILING.—The expression of sorrow by loud cries is several times alluded to in the Gospels: Mt 2<sup>18</sup> 'In Rama was there a voice heard'; Mt 11<sup>17</sup> 'We have mourned unto you' (cf. Lk 23<sup>27</sup>, Jn 16<sup>20</sup>). The Jewish custom is abundantly evidenced from the OT (see esp. Jer 910.17); in the Gospels only two instances are detailed, one at the death of Jairus' daughter, and the other at the death of Jairus' daughter, and the other at Christ's death. On both of these occasions mourning with loud cries is indicated (Mt 9<sup>23</sup> 'fluteplayers,' 'tumult'; Mk 5<sup>28</sup> 'wailing'; Lk 23<sup>27</sup> 'lamented,' έθρήνουν). The word used in Mk l.c. is dλαλάζειν (cf. Ja 5¹ δλολύζειν, 'howl'). In most other places the word tr. 'wail' or 'bewail' is κόπτεσθαι, literally, to beat upon the breast, so that any outcry is inferred only. The phrase δ κλανθμός καὶ δ βρυγμός τῶν δδόντων was formerly tr. 'wailing and gnashing of teeth' only in Mt 13<sup>42,50</sup>; but now the RV has brought these passages into line with the others where the same words occur, and correctly renders 'weeping.' See also MOURNING.

T. GREGORY.

T. GREGORY. WALK.—1. περιπατείν. The passages in the Gospels where this word occurs may be classified as follows: (1) 'To move along leisurely on foot without halting.' It is used in this literal sense of our Lord's walking by the Lake (Mt 418 περιπατῶν δέ),—the words following show that the subject of His thoughts as He walked was the analogy be-tween Peter and Andrew's present occupation and tween reter and Andrew's present occupation and the work to which He was about to call them, that of 'fishers of men,'—Mk 1<sup>16</sup> has the more vivid παράγων παρά, 'passing along by' (RV, cf. LXX Ps 128 (129)*); of His walking near Jordan, when His mien as He passed riveted John's gaze (Jn 1<sup>26</sup>); of His walking on the sea (Mk 6<sup>48</sup>· <sup>49</sup>, Mt 14<sup>26</sup>· <sup>26</sup>, Jn 6<sup>19</sup>—ἐπὶ τῆς θαλάσσης in Mk. and Jn., ἐπὶ τὴν θάλασσαν in Mt.).

'The genitive points to the apparent solidity of the water under His feet (cf. Mk 647 is) της τζε), the accumative to the progress implied in σιματιών (Swete, St. Mark, 130). Cf. LXX Job 98 σιματική κ ιπ ίδαρως ιπί θαλάσσης, 8316 ξιλθες δὶ ίτὶ πητήν θαλάσσης, is δὰ ῖχισιν άβίσσου σιμεσάπησας, Sir 248 in βάθυ άβίσσου στριστάπησας, Sir 248 in βάθυ άβίσσου στριστάπησας, Sir 248 in βάθυ αβίσσου στριστάπησας Sir 248 in βάθυ αβίσσου στριστάπησας, Sir 248 in βάθυ αβίσσου στριστάπησας Sir 248 in βάθυ αβίσσου στο δίσσου σ

Our Lord's walking on the sea reveals Him as making material nature an instrument through which His interest in us is shown (Illingworth, Div. Immanence<sup>1</sup>, 124), as coming to our aid across the troubled waters in which our conflict lies (Westcott, Characteristics of Gosp. Mir. 15, 19), and so leading us to the confidence expressed in Ro 8<sup>22, 35</sup>. The same word is used also of Peter's walking on the sea (Mt 14<sup>25</sup> περιεπάτησεν έπὶ τὰ δδατα), so that it is incorrect to say that Peter merely 'attempted' to walk on the water: the words imply that he made some progress in going words imply that he made some progress in going to Jesus. By the invitation 'Come!' Jesus expressed His warm sympathy with Peter in his desire for closer fellowship with Him, and gave a pledge that He would support him in the enterprise of his faith. The cause of his temporary failure was his betaking himself again to his own resources after having committed himself to a course that involved full dependence on Christ's strength. Then, after the grasp of our Lord's hand had revived his faith, he was really enabled to carry through what he had undertaken, probably walking on the sea with Jesus in returning to the boat (cf. A. B. Davidson, Waiting upon God, 241, 250). Two texts, Jn 155 and Ph 413, show how we should apply this narrative to ourselves. περιπατείν is also used: of men's gait, whereby the blind man who was being gradually restored to sight recognized the true nature of the objects which he would otherwise have taken for trees (Mk 824 βλέπω τούς delegations δτι ώ δένδρα όρῶ περιπατοῦντας, 'I see men; for I perceive objects like trees, walking'; cf. Jg 9<sup>36</sup>; Swete, in loc.); of people's walking over hidden graves (Lk 11<sup>44</sup>: see WOE); of the scribes, rῶν θελῶντων περιπατεῦν ἐν στολαῖς (Lk 20<sup>46</sup> | Mk 12<sup>36</sup> 'love to go in long clothing,' AV; see DRESS); and in the question with which the Risen Lord began the conversation with His two disciples whom He joined on the road to Emmaus (Lk 24<sup>17</sup> rires of λόγοι . . . οθε άρτιβάλλετε . . . περιπατοῦντες ; cf. λόγοι . . Mk 16<sup>12</sup>).

(2) Of those to whom Jesus miraculously restored the power of walking: the paralytic (Mk 2º || Mt 9º, Lk 5²²). No passage in the Gospels is more significant of the character, or more persuasive of the credibility, of our Lord's miracles of healing than this. He says to the paralytic, 'Son, thy sins be forgiven thee'; and in order that those who cavil at this saying 'may know that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins,' He commands 'Arise, take up thy bed, and walk,' which was, from their point of view, a harder thing for Him to say, because it could at once be proved whether His words had any effect. The miracle is thus an outward and visible sign of something greater than bodily healing; it points to an inward and spiritual power, destructive of evil, now present among men. It is implied that disease is the physical effect of sin (cf. Jn 514), and by healing the one our Lord gives an evidence of His power to destroy the other (cf. 1 Jn 3<sup>8</sup>). He teaches that the perfect idea of redemption is realized in 'a redeemed soul in a redeemed body,' and that He is come to deliver the entire personality of man, soul and body, from the dominion of evil (cf. Illingworth, l.c. 97). Man forgiven is enabled to 'walk and not faint' (Is 4031), and this looks forward to the time when 'the inhabitant of Zion shall not say, I am sick; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity' (Is 33<sup>24</sup>, cf. Rev 7<sup>14-17</sup>). So of the impotent man at Bethesda (Jn 5<sup>8</sup> s. 11-12 —a Sabbath miracle: the others being Mk 1<sup>23, 31</sup> 31 and ||, Lk 13<sup>14</sup> 14<sup>3</sup>, Jn 9<sup>14</sup>); the lame who walk (Mt 11<sup>5</sup> 15<sup>3</sup>), Lk 7<sup>22</sup>; cf. LXX Is 35<sup>5</sup> lσχύσατε . . . γύσατα παραλελυμένα, also v.<sup>6</sup>; Ac 3<sup>6</sup> 14<sup>8</sup>); also of the daughter of Jairus whom our Lord raised from the dead (Mk 5<sup>62</sup> περιεπάτει, 'she began walking about'). In all His raisings from the dead there was an immediate restoration of the bodily powers (Lk 715,

(3) It is also used in a special sense of our Lord's life of movement and unwearied activity. This use of περιπατεῦν is peculiar to St. John. In Jn 11<sup>2 10</sup> Jesus speaks in parabolic fashion, first of His having a full working day (cf. 9*) of twelve hours, during which He walks in the light of life without fear of danger in the path of His heavenly Father's will. and then of the coming on of the night of Jn 1144). itear of danger in the path of His heavenly father's will, and then of the coming on of the night of death, when walking, as regulated by present conditions, will be ended for Him; because it is His enemies' 'hour,' coinciding with that permitted to 'the power of darkness' (Lk 22<sup>58</sup>; cf Jn 13<sup>50</sup>; Plummer, St. Luke, 513; Camb. Bib. St. John, 230). Jn 6<sup>56</sup> 'many went back,' καὶ οὐκέτι μετ' αὐτοῦ περκεπάτουν; the last words picture His journeyings to and fro in which they had been in the belief of so and fro, in which they had been in the habit of acand fro, in which they had been in the habit of accompanying Him on foot, and hearing His teaching. In the same sense: Jn 71' walked in Galilee, for he would not walk in Jewry'; 10<sup>22</sup> walking in the Temple ('ut in sua domo,' Beng.; cf. Mk 11<sup>27</sup>); 11<sup>24</sup> 'walked no more openly among the Jews.' This use of **reprareto** is also found in Rev 2<sup>1</sup> of our Lord's life of activity in His exalted state: 'walketh in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks,' as if journeying forth by the circular route which, after traversing all the Churches mentioned, returns to traversing all the Churches mentioned, returns to Ephesus (Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches, 'Letter to the Church in Ephesus,' Introduction). It is likewise used by our Lord of Peter's working life (Jn 21<sup>15</sup> περιεπάτεις ὅπου ἡθελες, as when he had said to his fellow-disciples, 'I go a fishing,' v.³), and of the life of the redeemed (Rev 3⁴ περιπατήσουσι μετ' ἐμοῦ ἐν λευκοῦ; cf. Zec 3⁴ ¹), which is thus suggestively represented as a life of action conjoined with purity (cf. 1. In 3² ²) conjoined with purity (cf. 1 Jn 32 3).

(4) 'To act and behave in any particular manner,' 'to pursue a particular course of life': Mk 75 (the only passage in the Synoptic Gospels where περι-πατεῖν is used in this sense—'why walk not thy disciples κατά την παράδοσιν των πρεσβυτέρων'; κατά disciples κατα την παραδοσίν των πρεσμιτέρων; κατα indicating conformity with a standard [as in Ro 84 1415, 2 Co 102.8, Eph 22; Win.-Moult. 500]. πρης in Rabbinical language is 'the rule by which men must walk' [π|π]; cf. Swete, in loc.; see TRADITION), Jn 812, where the condition of 'not walking in darkness' (= ignorance and self-deception, regressions and death) is stated to be narrowness, joylessness, and death) is stated to be our 'following the Light of the world,' Jesus our Sun (cf. 11<sup>9</sup>, Ps 27<sup>1</sup>, Is 9<sup>2</sup> 42<sup>6</sup> 60<sup>18, 20</sup> Mal 4<sup>2</sup>), whose rising is the signal to awake and work (Eph 5<sup>14</sup>, He 3<sup>13</sup>), and whose movement as He mounts to attain His perfect day is a call to progress in righteousness and love (Ps 195, Pr 415, Ph 314). St. Paul developed this figure: he who follows the Light of the world becomes himself 'light in the Lord' (Eph 5<sup>8</sup>, 9, 1 Th 5<sup>8</sup>). Cf. Jn 12<sup>85</sup> ('fides non est deses sed agilis in luce,' Bengel. So also is love, 1 Jn 2<sup>9-11</sup>).

πιριτωτίν is used of the conduct of life; Aquila, Gn 5<sup>22</sup> (Enoch) πιριτωτίν εν τω διώ, where LXX has ευπρετωτε (cf. He 11<sup>5</sup>); LXX 2 K 20<sup>3</sup>, Ps 11<sup>9</sup> (12<sup>5</sup>), Pr 8<sup>20</sup>, Ec 11<sup>9</sup>. St. Paul uses τιριτωτείν in the ethical sense thirty times, and it is found in this sense in all his Epistles except Philem. and the Pastorals. He has also another word for 'to walk' which is not found in the Gospels (στωχώ, 'to march in file'). This word 'may imply a more studied following of a prescribed course than τιριτωτίν' (Ellic. on Gal. 122). Compare with the passages in St. John's Gospel, 1 Jn 16.7 26.11, 2 Jn 4, 3 Jn 3.4

2. πορεύεσθαι is used in the same sense as περιπατείν (3) in Lk 1333 'I must walk to-day, and tomorrow, and the day following'; 'I must go on my way,' RV. 'The duration of my course is ordained by God, and no power on earth can shorten it (cf. Jn 11st; Burkitt, Gosp. Hist. and its Transmission, 95). It is used in the same sense as περιπατεῦν (4) in Lk 16 ('walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless'); cf. LXX Pr 10° (with Barrow's Sermon) 142, Mic 68 πορεύεσθαι μετὰ κυρίου θεοῦ σου, 'to walk humbly with thy God,' AV and RV.

WALLET (RV tr. of πήρα, Mt 10<sup>10</sup> etc.; AV 'scrip').—This corresponds to the kèlī hārō'īm, or yalkūt, of 1 S 17<sup>40</sup> (see, however, H. P. Smith, Samuel, in loc.). It is a bag made of partially tanned kid-skin, bound by a strap round the waist, or slung from the shoulder. In it the shepherd carries his supply of provisions when going the flock to distant pasture. The coarse loaves of the country, olives, and dried fruit form the staple diet, with an occasional lump of cheese. wallet, with an occasional lump of cheese. The wallet, however, serves the purpose of the boy's pocket among ourselves, and often contains a curious assortment of articles. The AV 'scrip' appears in our literature with the same meaning. Milton (Comus, line 626) speaks of the shepherd's 'leathern scrip' in which are carried 'simples of a thousand names' (cf. Shakespeare, As You Like It, Act iii. sc. 2). Setting out on a journey, the Syrian peasant carries a wallet well furnished, which he opens for refreshment as he rests by the

W. EWING. WAR (πόλεμος).—As the Gospels record the story of Christ, whose mission was to bring 'peace on earth and goodwill to men,' the references to war are not numerous. But St. Luke has three references well worthy of attention.—1. In Lk 314 'the soldiers' (στρατευόμενα, RVm 'soldiers on service') consult John the Baptist. It is not possible to say who the soldiers were, or in what expedition they were engaged, but they were not Roman soldiers, or any part of the force of Herod Antipas against his father-in-law Aretas, since the quarrel between Herod Antipas and Aretas had not developed then.—2. In Lk 14<sup>31</sup> (where He is enforcing the general lesson that we should not undertake what we have neither the strength nor the will to achieve, or enter upon His service unless we are prepared, if necessary, to sacrifice life itself) our Lord draws attention to the action of a king in calling a council of war. Possibly there is here a historical allusion to the war between Herod Antipas and Aretas (Jos. Ant. XVIII. v. 3).—3. In Lk 19<sup>43</sup> our Lord shows His familiarity with the history of warfare when He prophesies that the enemy will cast up a bank  $(\chi d\rho a\xi)$  or a trench round Jerusalem. This prophecy was literally fulfilled forty years afterwards, when Titus surrounded Jerusalem with a palisaded mound and wall of masonry (agger and vallum).

Jesus seems to have recognized war as rising from the nature of man and the constitution of society; but as His teaching lays hold upon nations, the methods of war become less barbarous, and we have good cause to anticipate a time, and to work for it, when 'nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.' While, therefore, Jesus Christ did not condenin war in the abstract, the whole spirit of Christianity is against it (see Hastings' DB, art. 'War').

COLL. A. MACDONALD.

WASTE.—The idea of waste is presented in the Gospels in two figures. (1) The first of these appears in the word διασκορπίζω, which indicates the scattering of one's possessions. It is the act of the man who, like the Prodigal, makes 'ducks and drakes' of his goods (Lk 15<sup>13</sup>), or, like the Unfaithful Steward, squanders his master's property (Lk 161).

(2) The second word is ἀπώλεια, which denotes the doing to death of that which should have remained to enrich and beautify life. Judas thought mained to enrich and beautify life. Judas thought that the pouring forth of the ointment upon the head of Christ was  $d\pi\omega\lambda\epsilon\omega$  (Mt 26<sup>8</sup>||). In his opinion it was waste, because the price of it might have been added to his bag, and might have remained to enrich himself (Jn 12<sup>8</sup>). It was put to a use which did not commend itself to him, and this seemed to the man in whose heart the love of a once accepted Master had now been usurped by the money with which he had been entrusted, a loss of something like 'three hundred pence' (Mk 145). It is very significant that Christ used the word, which Judas had applied to Mary, of Judas himself. So sudas had applied to Mary, of Judas himself. So far wrong was he that Mary had rendered an ever memorable act of devotion. The true 'waste' was in himself; he was the 'son of waste' ( $\delta$  vids  $\tau \hat{\eta} s$   $d\pi \omega \lambda \epsilon las$ , Jn  $17^{12}$ ). See art. Judas Iscariot in vol. i. p.  $909^{b}$ . W. W. Holdsworth.

WATCH.—1. The noun 'watch' in the Gospels represents (1) κουστωδία (Lat. custodia) in Mt 27<sup>85.66</sup> 28<sup>11</sup> AV ('guard' RV). This word, which is said to have been the technical term for a company of 60 men, is used here to describe either the Roman soldiers, whom the chief priests and Pharisees obtained from Pilate, or the Temple guard, which he reminded them they already had and could employ to protect the sepulchre from being rifled. (2) φυλακή, where it denotes the divisions of the night either into 3 (Jewish and Greek; cf. Lk 1286 (?)*) or 4 (Roman; cf. Mk 1325) parts. The word in this sense occurs (a) in the account of our Lord's walking upon the Lake of Galilee, which was 'at the fourth watch,' i.e. just before dawn (Mt 14<sup>25</sup>, Mk 6<sup>46</sup>); (b) in His remarks upon the uncertainty and unexpectedness of the Presence (παρουσία) of the Son of Man (Mt 24<sup>48</sup>, Lk 12<sup>38</sup>). (3) φυλακή in an active sense, denoting a watching or keeping watch (Lk 28).

2. 'Watch' as a verb.—The duty of constant watchfulness (γρηγορεῖν) and vigilance (ἀγρυπνεῖν) is insisted upon by our Lord in two main connexions: (a) in regard to the particular, immediate need for it on the night of the Betrayal (Mt 26<sup>28, 40, 41</sup>, Mk 14<sup>24, 28</sup>), and (b) in regard to the general attitude of disciples who await their Lord's Return (Mt 2444 5, Mk 1353 34 37, Lk 1237 39 2138).

* It is not unlikely that in this case the fourth watch is not named, simply because the return is not likely to be so long delayed. So Meyer, Alford, Bruce, etc.

* Edersheim compares certain Rabbinical ordinances which laid down that no man might go on the Temple Mount with his staff or with shoes, or with his scrip, or with money tied to him in his purse. Whatever he might wish to contribute must be carried in his hand, possibly to indicate that the money about him was exclusively for an immediate sacred purpose. He suggests that, for similar reasons, Jesus transferred these very ordinances to the disciples when engaged in the service of the real Temple, and says the direction of Mt 109 will then mean: 'Go out in the same spirit and manner as you would to the Temple services, and fear not,—'for the workman is worthy of his meat.' In other words: Let this new Temple service be your only thought, undertaking, and care' (The Temple, etc. p. 42).

As to the general attitude or frame of mind in which the Church is bidden by her Lord to look for His coming, the burden of His teaching is that ours must be the steadfast, active readiness of dutiful, trusty servants, who are not afraid of being caught idle or in mischief, when the Master appears and reveals His welcome, though awful presence.

C. L. FELTOE.

WATER  $(b\delta\omega\rho)$ .—For an Eastern country, Palestine (except in the Negeb and the districts which are desert) has a fairly abundant supply of water. It is described as 'a land of brooks (torrent-valleys), of fountains and depths, that spring out of the valleys and hills' (Dt 87). It is a matter of dispute whether the climate has changed since OT times. The rainy season is in winter, from November to March, when the rains are generally heavy. At other times there are only occasional showers. 'The former rain and the latter rain' (Dt  $11^{14}$ ) come about the autumn and spring equinox respectively. The rainfall on an average is from 25 to 30 inches in ordinary seasons (the average rainfall in England is less than 30 inches), but there are times of drought which cause great loss and suffering. In Galilee the water supply is much greater than in Judæa. The storage of water is much more imperfect than in former times. In many places the ruins of artificial tanks, pools, and aqueducts are visible. The chief waters which are referred to in the Gospels are those of the Sea of Galilee and the river Jordan.

Water is frequently mentioned in the Gospels (most instances are found in Jn.), both in its literal and figurative meanings. 1. Literally: e.g. 'Jesus went up straightway out of the water' (Mt 3<sup>16</sup> || Mk 1<sup>19</sup>); 'Send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water' (Lk 16<sup>24</sup>); 'John was baptizing in Ænon, near to Salim, because there was much water there' (Jn 3<sup>22</sup>). The water of the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5<sup>1-1</sup>) was supposed to have curative powers. Part of v.³ ('waiting for the moving of the waters') and the whole of v.⁴ are now rejected by critical editors. The moving of the water was a natural phenomenon, the flow of the spring being intermittent. The disciples who were sent to prepare for the observance of the Passover were instructed to look for 'a man bearing a pitcher of water' (Mk 14<sup>13</sup> || Lk 22<sup>10</sup>). As water is usually carried by women in the East, the man bearing the pitcher would easily be distinguished. It was perhaps a token arranged beforehand, so that the place of observance should not be known till the last moment. See also art. PITCHER. In Jn 19<sup>34</sup> it is recorded that at the crucifixion of Jesus one of the soldiers pierced His side with a spear, and forthwith there came out blood and water; see art. BLOOD AND WATER.

2. The figurative use of water in the Gospels is varied. It is a symbol (i.) of the moral cleansing of life in repentance, 'I baptize you with water unto repentance' (Mt 311, Mk 18, Lk 318, Jn 123-26); (ii.) its symbolical reference in connexion with the new birth is admitted, but its significance is uncertain, 'Except a man be born of water and spirit (ἐξ δδατος καὶ πνεύματος), he cannot enter into the kingdom of God' (Jn 38). The phrase 'water and spirit' has been regarded as an instance of hendiadys, and interpreted as 'spiritual water' (Neil, Figurative Language in the Bible). Others take it as referring to the baptism of John, and as indicating that repentance is an essential factor in the new birth (Expos. Times, vol. iii. p. 318). It has also been interpreted as referring to the sacrament of baptism. This is the most ancient and general view. Wendt and others, however, regard the words δδατος καί as a post-Apostolic interpolation (Gospel according to St. John, ad loc.). This is the most probable conclusion, unless the words are interpreted as referring to the baptism of John unto repentance; see Expos. Times, vol. xv. p. 413. (iii.) Water is also used as a symbol of innocence: Pilate took water, and washed his hands before 'Pilate took water, and washed his hands belove the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person' (Mt 27<sup>24</sup>). (iv.) As a sign of hospitality or respect (see Gn 24<sup>26</sup>43<sup>24</sup>). Jesus said to Simon the Pharisee, 'I entered into thy house, thou gavest me no water for my feet' (Lk 7<sup>44</sup>). (v.) At the supper in the upper room (Jn 13<sup>1-17</sup>) the water for the feet had not been provided. The disciples had not noticed the omission, or they were each unwilling to undertake the servile duty. Then 'Jesus riseth from supper, and laid aside his garments; and took a towel, and girded himself. After that, he poureth water into a bason, and began to wash the disciples' feet' (Jn 13<sup>4-5</sup>). The ordered detail of the narrative is an indication of the profound impression which the action of Jesus had made upon the Evangelist. The act was full of significance. It was a symbolic service. It taught the disciples the duty of humility, and the need of daily cleansing from the daily defilement of sin. (vi.) In His conversation with the woman of Samaria, Jesus linked the water which she sought at the well with the living water which He alone could give. He uses it as a symbol of eternal life, the blessings of the gospel in their satisfying and permanent power of good (Jn 4<sup>11-15</sup>). (vii.) On the last day of the feast Jesus stood in the Temple and cried, 'If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth in me, as the scripture saith, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water' (Jn 7<sup>371</sup>.). The Evangelist interprets the symbol: 'This spake ne Evangelist interprets the symbol: 'This spake he of the Spirit, which they which believed on him should receive: for the Holy Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified' (v. 20). The accuracy of the interpretation has been doubted (Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, vol. i. p. 256 n.). (viii.) It is also used as a symbol of the smallest service: 'Whosoever shall give unto one of these little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of little ones a cup of cold water only in the name of a disciple, verily I say unto you he shall in no wise lose his reward' (Mt 10<sup>42</sup> || Mk 9<sup>41</sup>). It is possible to punctuate the sentence so that it reads 'a cup of cold water only' or 'only in the name of a disciple.' But the first is greatly to be preferred.

The view of Westcott, first put forth in 1859 in a note to his Characteristics of the Gosp. Mir. (p. 14), and afterwards stated more fully in his Com. on St. John (37, 38), that it was not the water in those vessels that was changed into wine, but the water which the servants drew from the source after having filled the vessels, has commended itself to many students of the Gospels. But it has not superseded the traditional view, which must be acknowledged to have in its favour the first impression produced on the minds of readers of the narrative in all ages,—a fact of great weight. Readers in general have understood that the number and capacity of the vessels were stated immediately before the command to fill them, in order to convey the idea that their entire contents were changed into wine (Dods, Expos. Gr. NT i. 704), and also that the clause 'they filled them up to the brim' was added in order to exclude all possible suspicion of collision (Trench, Mir. 104, after Chrya.). Such are the principal objections to Westcott's view, which, however, must not be hastily pronounced to be inadmissible, or even improbable. When the arguments in its favour are carefully weighed, the balance seems to be almost equal between it and the ordinary view improbable. When the arguments in its favour are carefully weighed, the balance seems to be almost equal between it and the ordinary view.

(1) 'It is unlikely that water taken from vemels of purification should have been employed for the purpose of the miracla. This argument bolds good even supposing that the vemels had already been partially or wholly emptied by pouring water on the hands of the guests (Plummer, is loc.).

(1) The words 'Iraw out sow,' etc., are perhaps most naturally understood to mean that the mine action of drawing water from the source was to be carried on as before, but that the water so drawn was now to have a different destination. In like manner 1.7 seems to imply that the servants who had drawn the water had horne it, in obedience to Jesus' word, straight from the source to the ruler of the feast. It may, however, be argued that the 20 may equally well mean, 'Now that the vemels are quite full, bear from them to the ruler of the feast (in pitchen out of which he would fill the cups of the guests, lieyer, in loc.).

(iii.) Though it would be hamardous to say that the words a seriasive se also in v * render it probable that they calso from the source) is to be understood after arrhvers in v? It may, by the stated that arrhans is frequently used of the drawing of water (cf. On 243, fix 24, le 123, Ju 67 lb), but rarely of this drawing of wine, so that on the whole the use of the words in favour of Westcott's view.' (iv.) It is suggested that this view is instructed. The turning of the water into wine was a squasibly which Jesus manifested His glory. The filling of the the feast with water ware part of the 'sign,' and pointed to the fulfilling of the Law (cf. Mt.53). At the command of Jesus 'they filled them up to the brim'. This may have been designed to show that the preparation of the Law was now complete. It had reached the highest act in its relation to the Law. The vensule were filled and then left as they stood, which was intereded to represent that what the Law with the should ar

2. In 420 appears of the idelar airis is proof. The waterpot of the woman of Samaria was one of those jars of sun-dried clay which are still in use in the East, and which are carried upon the head or on the shoulder (Energy Bibl. i. 887, iii. 3818; Land and Book, 576; Lane, Mod. Egyptions, i. 187-188, who calls attention to the word garrah or purrah for a water pitcher, from which our word

"Dr Giles of Emmanuel Collega, Cambridge, has favoured the writer with the following note on the use of areals." If do not know of any example in Attic Greek of areals in the sense of 'draw wine' (for which areas or agreem (in poetry) would be expected) except the following from a fragment of Therecrates, the nomic poet, areas. The plantage area (Meineke, Pring ill 300). Though the crinic poets have so much to may of wine, this, apparently is the sole instance. It was possibly along, and the verb is certainly used by the Alexandrian writers as a slang word, as in the recently discovered Hervika, iv 14, no year of which is constituted and areas of the constitute of the Meineke, Pring ill 300). The use for wine had also continued, because in Theoretics 2. 13 occurs the provert in each area for this of the point in the sheltes?

Something nearer NT times would be useful, but I cannot discover that it occurs in the Papyri.

'jar' is derived). Her leaving her waterpot was not, as some say, because her faith in thrist made her forget the purpose for which she had originally come, but because it impelled her to announce her discovery of Him to others without delay; and in her haste to return to Sychar with the news, she did not choose to be encumbered with her heavy waterpot, which could be fetched at any time.

MAY. The term 'way is used in the OT and NT in a great variety of senses, physical (see art. ROADS) and moral. Any good concordance will show the frequency of the word and the range of its application. Jesus calls Himself 'the Way.' I am the way, the truth, and the life, no man cometh unto the Father, but by me' (Jn 14°). In the remarkable interview in which this passage occurs, the subject of convervation was the goal of life, the ultimate destiny of the little company. 'I go to prepare a place for you.' The declaration was an enigma. Thomas and Philip gave expression to the perplexity of the rest. 'We know not whither thou goest, and how can we know the way?' The echither is (1) union with God, (2) the Father's home, and as a corollary, (3) holiness. But the way to the end—what is it' I am the way.' As if He said, 'Through me, through what I have been teaching, through what I am about to do.' They had forgotten, or not understood, that He was the Incarnate Word, that He and the Father were one, and that He was laying down His life for them; but when they did understand these things then they would know the way. In He 10<sup>th, 20</sup> the blood of Christ seems to be the way 'Having therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way which he hath consecrated for us.' Those who believe in Christ are 'of the Way' (Ac 9° 19° 22°). Saul 'desired of the high priest letters to Damascus to the synagogues, that if he found any that were of the Way, he might bring them bound unto Jesus claimed to be the Way? A way leads to somewhere. Christ the new and living way leads to somewhere. Christ the new and living way leads to somewhere. Christ the new and living way leads to somewhere. Christ the new and living way leads to holiness, and heaven, and God.

WAYBIDE.—Two blind men sat by the wayside begging, as Jesus left Jericho on His way to Jerusalem (Mt 20<sup>20</sup>). They had probably taken their station at a spot near the city where several paths met, and which may have been planted with trees. Again, in the parable of the Sower, some of the seed fell 'by the wayside' (Mt 13'), i' along the road (ναρά τὴν ὁδον), where the ground was so hard as to be impenetrable by it. Jesus gave His own interpretation of the parable. (1) Owing to their hardness of heart men do not understand the word. They hear but do not heed. It falls like seed on a drumhead; and then (2) the fowls of the air come and devour it. Hearts worn hard by selfishness and worldliness do not give entrance to the Divine truth, and the truth lying there is either trampled and destroyed by cares and anxieties, or snatched away by the host of passing thoughts.

WEALTH,-1. The Gospels differ from each other very considerably in their contributions to the subject of wealth. The Gospel of Jn. contributes scarcely anything. Such words as πλούσιος, πλούσιος, πλουτεῖν, θησαυρός, θησαυρίζειν do not occur in it; and πτωχός is found only in 125.6.8 and 1326. Mk. contributes little—only 419 and a few characteristic contributes little—only 419 and a few teristic touches in the narrative of the Rich Young Ruler and the discourse following upon it, as for instance 10<sup>24</sup>. It is to Mt. and Lk. that we are indebted for practically all the teaching in the Gospels on this subject. And the material supplied by them is specially rich. But it is not uniform. There is a contrast between the teaching on wealth in Lk. and that in Mt. Lk. has preserved a series of utterances of our Lord, which on the face of of utterances of our Lord, which on the face of them seem hostile to wealth and partial to poverty. These consist partly of sayings peculiar to Lk. and partly of sayings common to Lk. and Mt., but having in Lk.'s version a sense apparently less favourable to wealth. The following sayings regarding wealth are peculiar to Lk.: 183 311 418 634-25 1213-21 1412-14. 23 161-13. 19-31. The following are illustrations of sayings common to Mt. and Lk., but with an apparent bias against wealth in Lk.'s version of them: Mt 53, cf. Lk 620; Mt 619-21, cf. Lk 1822; in the parable of the Marriage Feast (Mt 221-14) it is the parable of the Marriage Feast (Mt 22!-14) it is the 'good and bad' who are gathered in from the highways, in the parable of the Great Supper (Lk 14<sup>18-24</sup>) it is the 'poor and maimed and blind and lame.

Because of these differences the Gospel of Lk. has been charged with Ebionism (wh. see). It has been said that it preaches the sinfulness of wealth and the merit of poverty. By some this characteristic is taken to be a faithful reproduction of the spirit and teaching of Jesus; by others it is attributed to Lk. or to his sources, or to the influence of the sub-Apostolic period to which, by them, this Gospel is assigned. But before the Gospel of Lk. is credited with a bias against wealth and in favour of poverty, certain facts, pointing to a different conclusion, have to be taken account of. In the first place, what might be con-strued as proofs of Ebionism are to be found in some of the other Gospels also. The strongest saying of Jesus against wealth, 'It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God,' is recorded by Mt. (1924) and Mk. (1025) as well as by Lk. (1825). by Mt. (19<sup>-4</sup>) and Mk. (10<sup>-6</sup>) as wen as by Lk. (10<sup>-7</sup>). So also are the incidents of Peter and Andrew, of James and John, and of Matthew or Levi leaving all to follow Jesus (Mt 4<sup>18-22</sup> 9<sup>9</sup>, Mk 1<sup>16-20</sup> 2<sup>14</sup>, Lk 5<sup>11, 27, 28</sup>). Mt. and Mk. tell of the Baptist's ascetic manner of life (Mt 3<sup>4</sup>, Mk 1<sup>6</sup>). It is to Mt. that we are indebted for the record of the sayings, 'Lay to the sayings, 'Lay are the for yourselves treasures mon the earth' not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth' (6<sup>19</sup>), and 'The poor have good tidings preached to them' (11<sup>5</sup>). In Mt 13<sup>22</sup> and Mk 4<sup>19</sup> Jesus is represented as using the phrase 'the deceitfulness of rights' world the statement of the deceitfulness of the statement of the riches,'-words not recorded by Lk.; and it is Mt. and Mk., not Lk., who have preserved the saying of our Lord in which He speaks of the blessedness of leaving lands  $(\Delta\gamma\rhoois)$  for His sake (Mt 19<sup>28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>28</sup>). On the other hand, Lk. reports incidents and sayings the reverse of Ebionitic. In the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus recorded by him alone (1619-31), rich Abraham is in bliss as well as poor Lazarus. It is Lk. who tells of the women of position who ministered to Jesus of their substance (8<sup>2-3</sup>). He alone records Jesus' injunction to His disciples, 'He that hath a purse, let him take it' (22<sup>28</sup>). To him we owe the story of Zacchæus, a rich man who won Jesus' commendation even though he still retained half his wealth (191-10). And he, in common with the other Evangelists, speaks in terms of approval of another rich man, Joseph of Arimathæa (23<sup>30-53</sup>). At the same time it can scarcely be doubted that the promi-nence accorded in Lk. to the contrast between poverty and wealth, and to sayings of our Lord which seem to favour the poor, indicates a deep interest on the part of the writer in the problem of wealth and poverty. See Poor and Poverty.

2. What, then, is the view of wealth presented in the Gospels? What, in particular, is Jesus' view of wealth? (1) He assumes, though He nowhere explicitly declares, the lawfulness of the possession of wealth. This is implied in such parables as those of the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>), the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>12-37</sup>), and the Unjust Steward (Lk 16<sup>1-8</sup>), all of which deal with the uses of money, without any disapproba-tion of its possession being indicated. It is implied in His parting injunctions to His disciples (Lk 22<sup>25.25</sup>), and in the saying, 'Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness' (Lk 16°), which also involve the possession and use of money. It is implied even in the demand which He made of the Rich Young Ruler and others to part with wealth (Mt 1921, Lk 1822 1223 1423), and in the exhortation, 'Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon the earth' (Mt 619). In each of these cases Jesus appealed to men to forego what He did not deny was their right. 'He was pressing on them a moral choice, not establishing an economic law' (Speer). The woes pronounced upon the rich and prosperous (Lk 6<sup>34-36</sup>) have parallels in the OT (Is 10<sup>3</sup>, Am 2<sup>5-7</sup> 8<sup>5</sup>), and are to be explained on the ground of the moral dangers of explained on the ground of the moral dangers of wealth as well as on the ground of the oppression of the pious poor by the rich. Nor is the fate of Dives (Lk 16<sup>19-21</sup>) any proof that Jesus condemned the possession of wealth as such. See DIVES.

(2) Jesus implies that wealth is the gift of God. This is the view of the OT (Ps 89<sup>11</sup> 50<sup>16-12.</sup> Is etc.). And it is accepted by Jesus and illustrated in the parables of the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-20</sup>), the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>12-27</sup>), and the Foolish Rich Man (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>). In all these gifts and possessions including wealth In all these, gifts and possessions, including wealth, are represented as bestowed on men by God. And this is made specially clear with regard to wealth in the parable of the Foolish Rich Man. The Rich Man's wealth came to him through the medium which is most evidently at God's discretion, namely, through his ground bringing forth plentifully. The same truth is implied in the petition, 'Give us this day our daily bread' (Mt 6<sup>11</sup>, Lk 11<sup>3</sup>), and in the sayings: 'If God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ve of little faith?' (Mt 630, Lk 1228); 'Your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. . . . All these things shall be added unto you' (Mt  $6^{32}$  33, Lk  $12^{30}$ . 31). And the description of wealth as  $\tau \delta$   $d\lambda \lambda \delta \tau \rho \omega \sigma$  (Lk  $16^{12}$ ) seems to carry with it the idea that wealth belongs really to God, and is only lent or entrusted by Him to men.

(3) Wealth, according to Jesus, is essentially  $\alpha$ subordinate good. It is characterized by Him as έλάχιστον (Lk 1610) compared with spiritual interests. It is too uncertain to be the goal of life (Mt 619. 20). Inasmuch as it is something outside man and apart from him, the possession of it does not necessarily contribute to riches of character, but may, on the contrary, coexist with poverty of soul (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup> 14<sup>16, 19</sup>, Mt 22<sup>6, 6</sup>). Nor will the possession of wealth compensate for the loss, of the true life (Mt 1626, Mk 836.37, Lk 925). Life, in fact, in the highest sense of the term, is a larger and richer thing than mere possession of wealth (Lk 1215.23, Mt 630.25.33): and it is, to a considerable degree, independent of wealth (Mt 6<sup>25, 33, 34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>22, 23, 29-34</sup>).

(4) Wealth is a means, not an end. It is subordinate to the great moral issues of life, and it is of value only in so far as it promotes the true purpose of life. It is a test and discipline of character. The getting, possessing, and spending of wealth develop qualities which survive death, and are fraught with important consequences in the are raught with important consequences in the world to come. This view of wealth is presented in the parables of the Talents (Mt 25<sup>14-30</sup>), the Pounds (Lk 19<sup>12-27</sup>), the Foolish Rich Man (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>), the Unjust Steward and Christ's comments on it (Lk 16<sup>1-12</sup>), Dives and Lazarus (Lk 16<sup>19-31</sup>), and in the picture of the Judgment of Men (Mt 2531-46). In these passages wealth is regarded as a trust committed by God to man, demanding in the possessor of it fidelity, watchfulness, and foresight. Faithfulness in the administration of the unrighteous mammon prepares for greater and more serious responsibilities in the world to come, and contributes to our well-being there (Lk 161-13); but failure to use wealth aright entails loss and con-demnation (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup> 16<sup>10-12</sup> 19-21). On the other hand, we are taught in the parable of the Unright-eous Steward that as the Steward employed his lord's wealth in securing for himself friends who would support him after he was deprived of his office, so we should administer the wealth committed to us in such a way that it will contribute to our well-being in the world to come.

As to how exactly this is to be done Jesus lays down no detailed rules, trusting rather to the impulses of the regenerate heart issuing in right action. Where love to God and love to man rule the life, wealth will be wisely administered. 'The cross of Christ is the solution of the social pro-blem' (Kambli). At the same time, we are not left without hints and indications as to how one left without hints and indications as to how one inspired by the enthusiasm of Christianity will deal with wealth. In acquiring wealth he will have regard to the rights and claims of his fellowmen as much as to his own (Mt 22<sup>29</sup> 7<sup>12</sup>, Mk 12<sup>51</sup>, Lk 6<sup>31</sup>). He will be sparing in his own personal expenditure, and will aim at simplicity of life (Lk 10<sup>31, 42</sup> RVm). He will be mindful of the claims of relatives (Mk 7<sup>10-18</sup>). He will contribute liberally in wifts and personal service for the claims of relatives (MK 7<sup>3-3</sup>). The win contribute liberally in gifts and personal service for the advancement of God's Kingdom, even at much sacrifice and inconvenience (Lk 21<sup>1-4</sup> 8<sup>1-3</sup> 23<sup>30-56</sup>). Nor need the gift necessarily be justifiable on purely utilitarian grounds: it may be artistically expressive of devotion and gratitude (Mt 26<sup>5-13</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3-6</sup>, Jn 12<sup>3-6</sup>, Lk 7<sup>35-50</sup>). Such a one will also relieve the needs of his fellow-men, either by almsgiving or by personal ministration, or in some other way suggested by circumstances (Mt 6<sup>2-4</sup> 19<sup>21</sup> 25<sup>31-46</sup>, Mk 10<sup>21</sup>, Lk 6<sup>30</sup> 10<sup>30-37</sup> 12<sup>33</sup> 14<sup>12-14</sup> 19<sup>8</sup>, Jn 13<sup>20</sup>), care, however, always being taken that ostentation or other wrong motives mar not the value of the gift or service (Mt 62-4). And Jesus, by His commendation of Mary for her gift of costly spikenard (Mt 26<sup>6-13</sup>, Mk 14<sup>3-9</sup>, Jn 12<sup>3-8</sup>), and of the woman who was a sinner for a similar act (Lk 7<sup>36-30</sup>), as well as by His presence at the marriage at Cana of Galilee (Jn 2<sup>1-11</sup>), and at feasts, and by His appreciation of nature, seems to sanction expenditure of wealth in ministering not merely to the necessities of men, but also to their happiness through the gratification of their social instincts and their love of beauty.

(5) But whilst Jesus implies the lawfulness of private possessions and gives guidance as to the right use of them, He is at the same time keenly alive to the perils attached to wealth; and His recorded utterances contain many warnings with This is the explanation of reference to them. those sayings of His which seem on the first reading of them to condemn wealth and the possession of it. He characterizes money as 'the mammon of unrighteousness' and 'the unrighteous mammon' (Lk 16<sup>8, 11</sup>), not because money is evil in itself, but because the getting and possessing and spending of it are so apt to lead to unrighteousness. Again,

He pronounces woe upon the rich and prosperous (Lk 6<sup>24, 25</sup>), not only because they were too often guilty of oppressing the pious poor, but also because their wealth exposed them to grave spiritual perils. And He indicates what some of these perils are. Wealth tends to delude a man as to his real worth, and to invest him with a factitious importance (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>). It tends to become a man's god, and to oust the true God from His supremacy in the heart (Mt 6<sup>24</sup>, Lk 16<sup>13</sup> 12<sup>16-21</sup>). The rich man is apt to trust in his riches, not in God, and to think that the possession of them insures him against adversity (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>). Wealth is also apt to make him forgetful of his indebtedness to God, and to lead him to regard God's gifts to him as his own absolute posses-God's gifts to him as his own absolute possessions to do with as he pleases (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>). Further, wealth has the tendency to deaden the possessor's sense of spiritual need and his aspirations after spiritual good (Mt 13<sup>22</sup>, Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup> 16<sup>19-31</sup>, Mt 22<sup>3</sup>, Lk 14<sup>18-20</sup>). It tends also to limit the possessor's thoughts to this present world and its interests, to the exclusion of higher things (Mt 6<sup>19-34</sup>, Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup> 16<sup>19-31</sup>). It is apt to come into conflict with the demands of the Kingdom of God and to indispose to the acceptance of them (Mt 19<sup>16-28</sup>, Mk 10<sup>17-27</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18-27</sup> 9<sup>57-82</sup> 14<sup>18-20</sup>, Mt 22<sup>5</sup>). There is the danger, too, of producing alienation of sympathy from our fellow-men and selfish ignoring of their needs and claims (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup> 16<sup>19-31</sup>). And, lastly, there is the danger of covetousness (Lk 12<sup>13</sup>, Mt 13<sup>22</sup>), wealth tending to breed the desire for more wealth (Lk 12<sup>16-21</sup>), though this sin may beset those also who do not possess (Lk 12<sup>13-15</sup>).

(6) These dangers, vividly realized by Jesus and greatly dreaded by Him, led Him to make use occasionally of language which, interpreted literally, would seem to teach the incompatibility of the possession of wealth with membership in the Kingdom of God. Such are the Woes pronounced on the rich and prosperous (Lk 624 25), the conversation following the incident of the Rich Young Ruler (Mt 1922 24, Mk 1023 25, Lk 1824 25), and the demand that whosever would be His disciple demand that whosoever would be His disciple must renounce all that he hath (Lk 1433). These utterances are to be explained partly by the circumstances of the age in which they were spoken. Jesus foresaw trouble and affliction for His followers. In the world they would have tribulation: they would be hated of all men for His name's sake. Hence, if they were to endure unto the end, it was necessary that they should hold property and friends and life cheap, ready to part with them for the sake of Christ (Mt 10<sup>34-39</sup>), Lk 14<sup>26</sup>). And this was specially incumbent on those who were to be the preachers and missionaries of the gospel (Lk 9<sup>87-42</sup>, Mt 8<sup>18-22</sup>). Hence Jesus' demand that those who would be His disciples should renounce all that they had. And hence also the severe things He says regarding the rich. But these utterances are to be interpreted also in accordance with Lesus' practice of ambedying His teaching in with Jesus' practice of embodying His teaching in bold, striking, picturesque utterances designed and fitted to arrest attention. He expresses Himself thus strongly in order to impress men in all ages with the extreme peril of wealth, and to admonish the rich that they should hold their wealth lightly, and be ready to sacrifice it if duty demands.

But Jesus went further, and in one case at least demanded of an aspirant for eternal life that he sell all and give to the poor if he would have treasure in heaven (Mt 1918-22, Mt 1017-23, Lk 1818-23). This demand may have been made to make clear to the Young Man the inadequacy of his observance of the Divine law, and especially the shallowness of his love for his neighbour. But more probably it was made in accordance with the principle, laid down elsewhere by Jesus, that whatever interests or relationships conflict with a man's spiritual well-being and with the claims of God's Kingdom should be sacrificed, even though in themselves legitimate (Mt 529.30 1910-12, Mk 943.45.47, Lk 1428). It was probably perceived by Jesus that the Young Ruler's wealth was interfering with his realization of the highest good, and would render loyal and enthusiastic discipleship impossible for him. Hence Jesus called upon him to part with it. Though this is the only case of the kind recorded in the Gospels, it may well be that there were others similar. But even though it stand alone, it is sufficient to establish the principle that the influence of wealth on the possessor may be so injurious to his highest interests that he must renounce it if he is to enter into life. WEARINESS.—The one reference to the weariness of our Lord which we find in the Gospels occurs in the account of His journey from Judæa into Galilee. We read that on His way, beaten down by heavy toil (κεκοπιακώs), He sat upon the well near to the village of Sychar (Jn 49). The allusion is an eloquent testimony to the fact that He who is touched by the feeling of our infirmity shared that infirmity in its commonest effect of physical exhaustion. See Humanity of Christ.

W. W. Holdsworth.

WEAVING.—In our Lord's day weaving was done by hand-looms, as still in the East generally. The loom, with its 'beam' and 'shuttle,' which furnished to OT poet and prophet figures of life's swiftness and brevity (cf. Job 76, Is 3812), is not directly mentioned in the Gospels. While in the earlier days in Palestine weaving was done mostly by men, later it fell more and more into the hands of women. The Rabbis did not give it a high place among the crafts. Among the materials used in weaving were flax, wool, camel's hair and goat's hair. Flax and wool made 'soft clothing' for the royal and the rich (Mt 118, Lk 1619), the rest were wrought into the coarser garments of the more austere, like John the Baptist (Mt 34), into the sackcloth of the mourner (Mt 1121, Lk 1013), or into tents or sails. Jesus wore a seamless garment (χιτων ἀρραφος, Jn 1923), woven in one piece, from the top throughout, made probably by faithful, ministering women (Lk 82t, Mt 2750); and when He was buried, the cloth in which His body was wrapped was of linen (Mk 1546, Mt 2759, Lk 2412, Jn 1940).

WEDDING GARMENT.—The parable in which the incident of the wedding garment occurs is recorded in Mt 22<sup>1st</sup>. As there is good reason to believe that the similar story told in Lk 14<sup>1cst</sup> is not a different version of the same parable, but another teaching given on a different occasion, there will be no attempt made to find what light Lk.'s parable of the Great Supper throws on it. The wedding garment fits in as naturally with Mt.'s story as it would be out of place in Lk.'s. Questions have been discussed with much learn-

Questions have been discussed with much learning as to whether the wedding garment means the righteousness of Christ or the righteousness of good works, whether it be something that we must do for ourselves or something that is done for us. The story, however, makes it quite plain that it is nothing we can do for ourselves. Those gathered from the highways and lanes had certainly no opportunity for making themselves garments that would be fit for the royal presence. There is no occasion to search for illustrations showing that in the East it was not uncommon at high festivals to provide guests with suitable garments, because whether that was the case or not historically, it is certainly the case parabolically. The attitude of the king throughout the story is represented as so generous that it is inconceivable that he should fling one of his guests into a dungeon because he was unable to find for himself a suitable marriage garment. The man is punished for his impudence in supposing that he could come into the king's presence just as he was. If, then, we inquire what the truth is that our Lord wishes to express, it is plainly this, which we find again and again in Scripture, that no one is clean in God's sight. And when this sinful condition is contrasted with God's absolute holiness, no conclusion can be drawn but that man as he is cannot stand in God's presence.

The wedding garment means, then, something that God supplies, enabling the sinner to stand in His presence. Now there is nothing in the spiritual world that properly answers to a cloak or garment. Here, dress may effect a deception, may make a man appear to be what he is not, but there all is real, and the character is seen through and through. Commentators have therefore rightly felt that the wedding garment must denote an element in character. It is not, on the one hand, what is popularly known as good works, because they may have no root in the character; nor is it some fictitious imputation of what does not really belong to us; nor is it, as Archer Butler suggests, a spirit of sympathetic joy with the wedding festivities. It is something the lack of which deserves searching judgment, the presence of which is absolutely necessary. What is it? Is it not that definite relationship with Christ which is so clearly expressed in the hymn—

'Rock of Ages cleft for me, Let me hide myself in thee,'

a relationship implying the closest possible union? It is not something fictitious or unreal, but something which the fact of sin demands. For just as the spirit of independence is a ridiculous assumption for the creature in the presence of his Creator, so that of dependence on a perfect character carries with it a definite moral quality.

It may be said that this interpretation explains the substantive but not the adjective, that we have a meaning for 'garment' but not for 'wedding garment.' The wedding of the parable stands for the union of God with humanity—the Incarnation. as we call it. The indifference to that fact is the heaviest condemnation the world can receive. That was the blunder of the commercial people of our Lord's time, who were so engrossed with their own business as to pay no attention to the presence of Christ in the world, and who, when it seemed as though it would interfere with their concerns, did their best to destroy it. The blunder of the outcast is to suppose that this wonderful condescension was not necessary. It is this that is depicted in the incident of the wedding garment.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.—The specific object for which the Gospels were composed did not call for anything like a full detailed use of metrical data. Within their limited compass there are only incidental allusions to a system, or rather systems, of weights and measures. These are naturally scanty and obscure. The most that can be done with them is to identify them as nearly as possible with equivalents in modern systems, and to ascertain their places in those that were current in the Palestine of NT times. At this last point a difficulty at once emerges, due partly to the absence of regard for accuracy and precision in such matters prevalent at the time and place, and partly to the mixture of standards derived from successive and widely differing populations coming in with successive waves of conquest and invasion. The situation was not unlike that of modern Syria, with its bewildering confusion of coinage and other standards of value, brought in and grafted on the native system by French, German, and English merchants.

It is generally agreed by expert metrologists that the basis and fountainhead of all systems of measurement is to be traced to Babylonia. But in passing into Western countries, the Babylonian system was naturally subjected to as many modifications as it entered regions, and gave rise to quite as many secondary or derivative systems. during the course of the interrelations of the peoples using them, mutually affected one another; peoples using them, mutually affected one another; and the result was a variety of values called by the same name, or by names derived from the same original. On account of this fact, etymological processes of reasoning are in this field of little value, if not altogether valueless and misleading. Moreover, throughout the whole history of metalegy there is a tendency noticeable to of metrology there is a tendency noticeable to-wards the shrinkage or reduction of primitive values, making it essential to distinguish with great care between the values current under the same name in different periods of history. In the attempt to reach the exact facts as far as the 1st cent. A.D. is concerned, it will be best to bear in mind that in Palestine during the OT period three main systems of metrology came into use more or less extensively, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Phœnician, and that to these, just before the times of Jesus, the Roman conquest added a fourth as a disturbing element.

I. WEIGHTS.—The primitive unit of weight was the shekel. This developed into two forms, the heavy and the light (cf. Kennedy in Hastings' DB, art. 'Weights and Measures'). The heavy shekel weighed 252.5 grs., and the light just one-half of that. Perhaps while the shekel was still being used in these forms, a third value was attached to the introduction of the Syrian shekel of 320. it by the introduction of the Syrian shekel of 320 grs., and a fourth value later, viz. the Phœnician of 224'4 grs. In Roman times the denarius was introduced. This was equivalent to the Attic drachm. But Josephus (Ant. III. viii. 2) represents the Hebrew shekel (class) as equal to a tetradrachm (4 drs.), and a drachm-denarius was fixed by Nero at 52 62 grs. At least approximately, therefore, for the lst cent. A.D., three units in the scale of weights may be determined, as follows: the drachm-denarius=52.5 grs., the light shekel= 105 grs., and the heavy shekel=210 grs. Of the higher units the mina is equated with 100 drs., and the talent with 60 minæ, hence the scale:

Dr.-Den. Shek. Tetr. Min. Talent. 52·5+grs. 105+ ,, 210+ ,, Drachm-Denar. Shek. (light) . Shek. (heavy) Tetradrachm 1 100 6000 Talent 25 1500 315000+ ,, 60 3000 1

In the Gospels the words  $\delta i \delta \rho a \chi \mu o \nu$  (light shekel, Mt 1724) and  $\tau a \lambda a \nu \tau \sigma \nu$  \* (talent, Mt 1824 25<sup>15-28</sup>) occur, but not as the names of weights; they are the designations of coins (see MONEY). The only term purely designating a weight is  $\lambda i\tau \rho a$  (pound, Jn 12<sup>3</sup> 19<sup>39</sup>). This was identified with the mina of the above scale as its approximate equivalent. Its exact weight in the Roman scale of weights is given as 5050 grs., or 11 oz. avoirdupois.

II. MEASURES.—1. Measures of Length.—The unit of linear measurement in earlier Biblical times was the cubit (1794). This was obtained by the adoption of the length of the forearm from the elbow to the tip of the middle finger as the standard. There are evidences that such a standard was early averaged, conventionalized, and made the legal unit among the Israelites, being introduced like other standards of the kind from Babylonia. The cubit did not, however, remain a fixed unit throughout. From Ezk 40<sup>5</sup> (cf. 43<sup>13</sup>) we learn that two standards of measurement called cubits had come into use, and were employed in the prophet's day, and that these differed by one hand's breadth. The common cubit was six handbreadths in length, the sacred cubit, seven. question of the absolute length of either is, therefore, resolved into the value of the handbreadth. It would be useless to discuss in detail the various processes through which the solution of the problem has been attempted. The results of these processes show a divergence of over nine inches. Conder (Handbook of the Bible) finds the cubit to be 16 in. in length. Petrie (Ency. Brit.<sup>9</sup> xxiv. 484) finds it to be 25·2. Between these extremes are the following: A. R. S. Kennedy (Hastings' DB, art. 'Weights and Measures'), 17·5 in.; Watson (PEFSt, 1897, 203 ff.), 17·7; Beswick (ib. 1879, 182 ff.), 17·72; Warren (ib. 1899, 229 ff.), 17·75 in.; Smith's DB, based on Thenius, 19·5 in.: and Petrie (PEFSt, 1892, 31), 22·6. If we set aside the extremes by Conder and Petrie and Smith's DB, the divergence in the remainder is reduced to a margin not larger than 25 inch. Iem has been attempted. The results of these reduced to a margin not larger than 25 inch. Accordingly, the consensus of the most recent investigation may be safely taken to fix the value of the cubit in inches at between 17.50 and 17.75. Therefore the symbol, 17:5+ may be accepted as the approximate value of the common cubit among the Israelites. Upon this basis the longer cubit of Ezk 40<sup>5</sup> was 20.6 in. This result coincides with the Egyptian metrological system, and it appears probable that, being introduced from Egypt as the equivalent of the royal Egyptian measure of the name, the cubit was gradually reduced until in Ezekiel's day the shorter form of it had been definitely fixed. This, then, persisted up to NT times, and was identified with the Roman cubitus of a little less than 17.5 in. (cf. Smith, Dict. of Antiq. p. 1227).+

The subdivisions of the cubit were the span, equalling half a cubit; the palm or hand-breadth, one-sixth of a cubit; and the digit or finger-breadth, one twenty-fourth of a cubit. The multiples in common use were the fathom, consisting of four cubits, and the reed, of six cubits. Hence the

In Egypl, too, there was a longer cubit and a shorter, and these two were related to one another as 7 to 6, their values in inches being respectively 19<sup>43</sup> and 16<sup>56</sup>.

* ταλαντιαιος in Rev 16<sup>21</sup> (cf. also Jos. BJ v. vi. 3) can in the nature of the case be only an approximation. The PEFSt, 1892, 2891., records the discovery of a large stone weighing 64000 gra. (41900 grammes), used as a heavy talent weight.

In the Gospels the cubit is mentioned in Mt 627, Lk 1229, and Jn 219. In all these passages it appears as an approximation, and neither requires nor admits of precise determination. Lengths less than that of the cubit are not alluded to. Of greater lengths the following occur, being outside the usual scale as given above. The stadium or furlong (Lk 2413, Jn 619 1118). The term is borrowed from the Greek scale, and appears there as the equivalent of 600 ft. (more precisely 600 ft. 9 in.), or 400 cubits. The mile (Mt 541) was also borrowed, but is taken from the Roman scale, and was equal to 7.5 Greek stadia (furlongs), or 3000 cubits (1700 yds.). The day's journey (Lk 241), which is a common Oriental way of reckoning distances of considerable length at the present day, seems to have been used in ancient times also. It is not, however, reducible to any definite equivalent, and was no doubt a very elastic term. See on this and on 'Sabbath day's journey,' art. JOURNEY.

2. Measures of Surface.—Of measures of area no

2. Measures of Surface.—Of measures of area no mention is made in the Gospels or in the NT anywhere. Occasional allusions to the purchase of land (Mt 13<sup>44</sup> 27, Lk 14<sup>18</sup>; cf. Ac 1<sup>18</sup>) are not of such a character as to include the measurement used in these and similar transactions.

3. Measures of Capacity.—These naturally fall into liquid and dry measures. Primitively the most common word for measure of volume in Bible lands was perhaps the seah (σάτον, μέτρον, cf. Mt 13<sup>25</sup>, which is also the usage of the LXX). This was the 'measure' par excellence. This, however, became differentiated at least as early as before the NT age into a unit of dry measure, and the hin, with twice the capacity of the seah, took its place in the corresponding liquid scale. Nevertheless, in ascertaining the values of both liquid and dry standards of measurement, the most convenient starting-point is the seah. This, on the one hand, is easily traceable in its equivalents in the Græco-Roman metrology, and, on the other, as the unit on which the ephah-bath is based, furnishes a key to the Palestinian metrology of both dry and liquid varieties.

As to the equivalency of the seah in the classical Græco-Roman system, the following data give testimony: Josephus (Ant. IX. iv. 5) says, 'A seah is equal to one and one-half Italian modii.' An anonymous writer, cited by Hultsch (Metr. Script. i. 81. 6), speaks to the same effect; so also Jerome (on Mt 13<sup>23</sup>), who, however, probably simply reproduces this representation. On the other hand, according to Epiphanius (Metr. Script. i. 82. 8), the seah was equal to one and one-quarter modii (20 sextarii); but that this is not a precise statement appears from the same writer's equating the seah with 22 sextarii elsewhere (Metr. Script. i. 82. 9). Indirectly from the identification of the bath, the vor, and the hin by Josephus, with their corresponding Roman equivalents (cf. Ant. VIII. ii. 9, XV. ix. 2, III. viii. 3), the value of the seah is computed at 22 sextarii; and as this agrees with the equation of the Babylonian ephah-bath with 66 sextarii (Hultsch, Griech. and Rom. Metr. ii. p. 412), it may be taken as correct.

This gives us the value of the scah in Roman scxtarii. The reduction of the sextarii to present-day English standards may be made either upon the basis of the calculations of Hultsch (Metrol. p. 453), which yield a sextarins of '96 pt. (cf. Smith, Dict. of Ant., followed by Harper's Dict. of Class. Lit. and Ant., ed. H. T. Peck), and a seah of 21+ pts. (2 gals. 2 qts. and 1+ pts.); or this reduction may be made upon the basis of the use of the Farnese congius (=6 sextarii) in the Dresden Museum, which yields a sextarius of '99 pts. The difference in results between these methods amounts to no more than '03 pt. in the Roman sextarius.

Neither of the two methods positively excludes the possibility of error, but the latter appears upon the whole more trustworthy. Thus in the reconstruction of a table we have the equation to start with: sextarius= '99 pt. The seah (22 sext. = 2 gal. 2 qts. 1.78 pts.) is, then, approximately 23+ pts

This yields for the dry measure the scale as follows:

			Log.	Kab.	Omer.	Sean.	Ephan.	Cor	•
Log Kab			ĭ				-		=	1	pt.
Kab			4	1					=	4	pts.
Omer			7.5	1.8	1				=	74	٠,,
Seah			24	6	3.6	1			=	23.7	5
Ephah			72	18	10	3	1		=	71-2	8
Cor (He	omer)		720	180	100	30	10	1	= 1	7128	"
And f	or th	ıe	liav	id tl	ie scal	le as	follows

		Log.	Hin.	Seah.	Rath.	Cor.
Log		ı					=	1	pt.
Log Hin		12	1				=	11.9	pts
Seah		24	2	1				23.8
Bath		72	6	3	1			71-2
Cor		720	60	30	10	1		712.8	- "

These two scales represent the values of measures of capacity of the later days of Judaism. For OT times the value of the seah would have to be made larger, and the table correspondingly increased. For practical purposes the log=sextarius=nt.equation may be deemed sufficient.

creased. For practical purposes the log = scxtarius = pt. equation may be deemed sufficient.

In the Gospels the following allusions to the scales occur. The scah (Mt 13<sup>23</sup>, Lk 13<sup>21</sup>) is the equivalent of one-third of an ephah, and so is meant to designate generally as large a quantity as was usually handled in household necessities. Three scahs are equal to 35½ qts. or 1 bushel. The cor (Lk 167) appears under the name of 'measure,' the expression being naturally a general and inexact one. The total quantity intended to be indicated is 100 cors or 1110 bushels.

Measures not included in the above scales occur as follows. The xestes (ξέστης, translated 'cup,' Mk 7<sup>4</sup>(9)) was probably a small and handy household vessel, with the capacity of a pint measure, and used as such. The modius (μόδιος, Mt 5<sup>16</sup>, Mk 4<sup>21</sup>, Lk 11<sup>23</sup>, tr. in all the English versions 'bushel') is not the English bushel, but the Hebrew seah. The name is borrowed from the Græco-Roman usage. The measure itself was, like the xestes, a useful household utensil. The metretes (μετρητής, Jn 2<sup>2</sup>, tr. 'firkin') is evidently the bath of the Hebrew scale, containing approximately 9 gallons.

WELL (πηγή, φρέαρ, Jn 48.11).—The one well mentioned in the Gospels is that of Jacob, near ancient Shechem, under the northern cliffs of Gerizim. There is no reasonable doubt that this is the well pointed out to this day as Bir Yα'kūb in the eastern opening of the pass of Nāblus. Samaritan, Jewish, Christian, and Moslem traditions support this identification with absolute unanimity. See JACOB'S WELL.

See Jacob's Well. There is a law of the well in the East, which, although unwritten, receives well-nigh universal homage. Drawing water from the cisterns or wells that abound in Palestine occupies much of the women's time. The stones round the mouth of many a well are scored deeply by friction of the ropes to which the bucket or leather dalur is attached. Few experiences are more trying than to pass one of these 'wells' in the heat, seeing the water in the cool depths but having 'nothing to draw with.' The appeal of the thirsty to one drawing, 'Give me to drink,' is never refused.

While surprised that a Jew, even when urged by thirst, should thus accost a Samaritan, the woman did not deny the Saviour's request. Even a Metawileh, one of the most fanatical of all Oriental sects, will give water to the thirsty, if appealed to, although to avoid the possibility of pollution he must destroy the vessel from which the infidel has drunk.

W. EWING.

WEST (δυσμή). — In Palestine the direction of the setting sun is also that of the sea, and the West is therefore the source from which rain is generally expected (1 K 1844, Lk 1264). The observed connexion between western clouds and rain led Christ to remark on the strange inattention to the spiritual trend of the times (Lk 12<sup>56</sup>). He attributed such disregard and misrepresentation to self-delusion resulting from insincerity. He recognized that the final stage of imperviousness and impotence had been reached, and that the Kingdom of Heaven required the removal of both

The reference to North, South, East, and West as the equal sources from which the Kingdom of Heaven was to draw its membership, indicated the universal scope of His own relationship to the world. The same truth is suggested in the vision of the New Jerusalem as the city with an equal number of open gates on its four sides (Rev 2113). Hence to-day, in the statesmanship of that Kingdom, it is unwise and wasteful to transport to the Christianity. Only the universal truths of the gospel should be presented to the universal mission field. East the controversies and cleavages of Western

WHEAT .- Of all the cereals, wheat is at once the most valuable and the most widely distributed. It has been cultivated from very early times, as is proved by the finding of wheat grains in some of the oldest Egyptian tombs. In what land it had its origin is unknown, but de Candolle assigns the honour to Mesopotamia. In Palestine its cultivation dates back to a time prior to the Hebrew conquest (Dt 8°). How long before cannot Hebrew conquest (Dt 8°). How long before cannot be said, but it was probably a considerable time. In the OT the most common name for it is  $\pi \pi \pi$ , which the LXX renders in most instances by  $\pi \nu \rho \delta s$  (Gn 30<sup>14</sup>, Ex 9<sup>22</sup> etc.) but sometimes by  $\sigma \nu \rho \delta s$  (Gn 30<sup>14</sup>, Ex 9<sup>22</sup> etc.) but sometimes by  $\sigma \nu \rho \delta s$  (Gn 30<sup>14</sup>, Ex 9<sup>22</sup> etc.) but sometimes by  $\sigma \nu \rho \delta s$  (Gn 40<sup>17</sup>, and the Vulg. by triticum and, in a few cases, frumentum. On the other hand,  $\sigma \nu \rho \delta s$  is used also to render  $\tau \sigma \delta s$  (Jr 23<sup>28</sup>, Jl 2<sup>24</sup>),  $\tau \rho \delta s$  (Nu 18<sup>12</sup>, Jer 31<sup>12</sup>),  $\tau \rho \delta s$  (Jos 5<sup>11</sup>), and  $\tau \rho \delta s$  (Gn 42<sup>2-3</sup>). In the NT this is the term invariably employed (Mt 3<sup>12</sup>, Lk 16<sup>7</sup> etc.), and in EV it is nearly always translated 'wheat.' Like the Heb. 121, however,  $\sigma \nu \rho \delta s \delta s$ lated 'wheat.' Like the Heb. 177, however, oîros is really a general term for the cereal. But we can readily understand how, just as in Scotland the word 'corn' has become practically the equivalent of oats, so in Palestine oîros should come to mean For it was the most common and the most valued of the staple products of the country, and was, as it still is, its principal breadstuff. Several varieties of wheat are grown in Palestine. Tristram (Nat. Hist. of Bible, 492) mentions specially three of them: Triticum compositum, T. spelta (which is the most common of all), and . hybernum.

Wheat is sown about November. shortly after the first rains have softened the soil and rendered it fit for ploughing. It is ripe in May or June, but the time of harvest varies for the different districts, being earliest in the low-lying Jordan Valley, and latest in the Lebanons. The processes of reaping, threshing, winnowing, and sifting have already been described (see AGRICULTURE). The return yielded by wheat varies greatly. Thirty-fold is, according to Tristram, reckoned a good return (op. cit. 489). But that applies to Palestine as it is now. The sixty-fold or hundred-fold of the as it is now. The sixty-fold of nundred-fold of the parable (Mt 13<sup>8</sup> ||) might well have been obtained in the days of its former prosperity. Wheat was an article of export from very early days (Ezk 27<sup>17</sup>, cf. Ac 12<sup>20</sup>), and even to this day considerable quantities are exported by way of Haifa and Beirut. It is obtained mainly from the Haurān.

HUGH DUNCAN. WICKED.—Wickedness (πονηρία) is sin contemplated, not in the light of judicial guilt, or even of moral badness, but of the active mischief which it works.

Four Greek words in NT are translated 'wicked' in EV.

(1) ἀθισμος (only in 2 P 27 317). This describes the man who will not walk according to the lines laid down (πίθισθαι) for him by others; the man who gratifies his own desires and whims, in defiance of public opinion, or even of Divine regulation.

(2) ἀνομος (Ας 256, and nine other times; ἀνομία, sixteen times). This word originally has to do by derivation with the sheep that will not stay in its own pasture (νομός), or the man who breaks through limits (νόμος) assigned, and hence signifies a lawless man. The thought is similar to that in (1).

(3) κακος. Meaning originally 'unpleasant' (cf. Lk 165, Ac 255, Rev 163), and then 'failing to answer expectation or fulfil the apparent reason for existence,' the word comes to mean 'morally bad' as opposed to ἀγαθός, morally good (Mt 2141 2448, Col 33 etc.).

Col 35 etc.).

Col 35 etc.).

(4) **ennp***. This is the usual NT word; and it occurs very frequently, being usually rendered 'wicked' or 'evil.' It is connected by derivation **eith toil (**e****eith. J. J. Schmidt suggests that, like the word 'villainy,' it has drifted from meaning labouring and hence 'lower class' to 'degraded' and thence 'vicious.' But it seems more probable that the root thought in **ennp***eith. Seems more probable that the root thought in **ennp**eith. Seems more probable that the root thought in **ennp**eith. A vivid picture of the thought involved is found in Mt 133**-30.36**si, where the truit of the 'wicked one, 's **ennp**eith. The bad man (**exa**eith may be content to sin alone, the wicked man (**ennp**eith.) seeks to draw away others also.

1. The causes of wickedness.—(a) The wicked one (Mt 13<sup>19. 38</sup>, Eph 6<sup>16</sup>, 1 Jn 2<sup>13. 14</sup> 3<sup>12</sup>, perh. Mt 6<sup>13</sup>, etc.). The first great source of evil is apparently the devil. He is the great mischief-maker who disarranges God's orderly world (κόσμος, Mt 48 1325, etc.), and is ever found in antagonism to Christ's dominion. (Mt 13<sup>37, 39</sup>, 1 Jn 5<sup>18-30</sup> RV). (b) Wicked spirits. Scripture reveals to us not only a general, but also an army of wicked spirits who are ever ready to do his work (see Mt 12<sup>45</sup>, Ac 19<sup>12.13</sup>, etc.). (c) Fallen human nature. Suggestions from without are reinforced by willingness from within. Depraved human nature (cf. Mt 7<sup>11</sup>) is traitor to Christ (Mt 15<sup>19</sup>, Mk 7<sup>22</sup>, Lk 11<sup>29</sup>, Ro 1<sup>20</sup>). This is the permanent condition of the world apart from Christ (1 Jn 519, Gal 14).

3. The consequences of wickedness.—The 'children of the wicked one,' if unredeemed from his service, will share his doom (Mt 13<sup>49. 50</sup> 25<sup>26. 30</sup>, Ro 1<sup>29. 32</sup>; cf. Eph 22. 3)

4. The remedy for wickedness.—God's attitude towards the wicked man is not one of implacable anger, but of winning kindness (Lk 6<sup>35</sup>). Reconciled through the cross of Christ (Col 1<sup>20, 21</sup>), the wicked man may find complete pardon for the past. Nay more, he may be so renewed in nature as to have no taste for his former way of life (Ro 12°, Ac 3°, 1 Co 5°, 1 Th 5°2). And further, he may not only be completely ransomed from the slavery in which he was formerly held (Mt 613, Jn 1715, 2 Th 33, 1 Jn 518 RV), but may become actually victorious, through the imparted power of Christ, over the evil one, who is now bitterly antagonistic to his former subject (I Jn  $2^{13-14}$ , Eph  $6^{11-13}$ ).

FIDOW (χήρα).—Four widows are referred to in the Gospels.

1. Anna of the tribe of Asher (Lk 224-11), a devont woman described as a prophetess, who had been a widow eighty-four years, and who constantly frequented the Temple, passing her time in fastings and prayers, and who, coming up at the moment of the presentation of the infant Saviour, moved by the spirit of prophecy, spake of Him to those present who were expecting the redemption of Jerusalem. The Lewis MS of the Syriac Gospels says that Anna lived only seven days with her husband, an alteration not improbably made by some scribe with the object of reducing Anna's age to a less unusual limit. See also art. ANNA.

2. The widow of Sarepta or Zareplath, referred to by our Lord in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk 42.28) as an instance of a Gentile who had entertained Elijah, and had received a blessing by his means. It has been suggested by A. Meyer (Jeni Matterspriche, iv. 8) that the word 'widow' here may have been 'Gentile' in some Aramaic original. [2.20] (armaitha), the feminine of 'Gentile' or 'Syrian' having been confused with [2.20] (armaitha), 'a widow.' If this were so, then our Lord's reference to Naaman the Syrian would be balanced by a reference to 'a woman who was a Syrian' or 'Gentile'.

would be balanced by a reference to 'a woman who was a Syrian' or 'Gentile.'

3. The widow of Nain (l.k 7<sup>(1-1)</sup>), a little town situated a few interest to the south of Mount Tabor in Galilee, to whom our Lord uttered His compassionate 'Weep not' just before restoring her only son to life. The people who witheased the miracle exclaimed that a great prophet had risen up among them, probably with reference to Elijah or Elisha, the former of whom, like Christ, had taised a widow a son.

4. The poor widow who cast her two intestinto the treasury (Mk 12<sup>n-n</sup>, Lk 21<sup>n-n</sup>), whom Christ commended. It should not be forgotten in practical applications of this incident and of our Lord's praise of the widow, that she cast in 'all her living, that is to say, her day's entire income, or 'all that she had to live upon until more should be earned' (Swete, and that consequently the phrase 'widow's inite is incorrectly applied to small sums deducted, and more or less easily spared, from a daily mesone

In addition to these four widows, who were actual persons, a widow is a character in one of our Lord's parables (Lk 181-8), who, having no power to enforce the justice she daims, obtains it at length by her importunity; and from this our Lord draws His a faction conclusion that God will hear and answer those who rry day and night unto Him. Further, widows are referred to by Christ (Mt 23-4 [omitted by RV]. Mk 124-1, Lk 204-1 as being often cruelly oppressed and defrauded by the Pharisees of His day.

It may be regarded as certain that our Lord's mother was a widow during the time of His ministry hence His recommendation of her, just before His death, to the beloved disciple (Jn 19<sup>26</sup>).

The honourable and important position which widows occupied in the early Church is entirely in harmony with the respectful and sympathetic tone in which they are referred to in the above places of the Gospels.

In the Lewis MS of the Syriai Gospels the Syrophientian woman (MK 75) is described as a willow. This may be another instance of the possible confusion of "widow" and "tentile alluded to above.

WIFE (your). - For the general subject see Family, Markings, Woman.

Our Lord places the claims of a wife above those of a father or mother, and emphasizes in the most striking way the spiritual and bodily unity, indissoluble except for one cause, of the two who have been joined together in marriage (Mt 19<sup>26</sup>). Mt 10<sup>26</sup>). And precisely because of His exalted conception of a wife's place in her husband's heart, He teaches the absoluteness of His own claims on the loyalty and obedience of His disciples, by setting them clearly in a man's eyes over against those of the wife of his bosom. It was on the same occasion on which He pronounced what might be called the Magna Charta of married womanhood that He uttered those solemn words about the need of forsaking a wife for His sake and the gospel's (Mt 19<sup>26</sup>, Mk 10<sup>26</sup>; cf. Lk 18<sup>26</sup>). And in the paralle of the Great Supper, among the rejected excuses of those who do not accept the gracious invitation, is that of the man who said, 'I have married a wife, and therefore I cannot come' (Lk 14<sup>26</sup>).

WILD BEASTS.—See Animals in vol. i. p. 64th f.

WILDERNESS. -The word or words (more or less synonymous) which the EV tr. by 'wilderness' or 'desert' afford a striking example of the difficulties which translators, and after them the ordinary readers of Holy Scripture, have to contend with, because that word does not convey to our mind the idea of something we know: in our western European countries there is not, properly speaking, any desert or wilderness, in the Biblical sense of the word. Thus, unable to consult our own experience, we have to fall back upon books we have read, and upon notions obtained in that way. Immediately there rises in our memory the view of a desert of sand, stretching itself out of sight in a complete solitude, and giving to the caravans of travellers scarcely any other choice but death from thirst, or burial under the moving soil blown up by some terrible windstorm. Such is the classical representation of a desert or wilderness, and it is a constant source of errors for the understanding of numerous passages of the Bible where that word occurs. There is no 'desert of sand either in Palestine or in the neighbouring countries. In fact, the Hebrew word which is usually tr. 'desert' or 'wilderness' (midbar) does not in the least convey the idea of solitude or desolation; on the contrary, it belongs to a root which means 'to pasture,' and therefore, etymologically, 'feeding-ground' or 'pasture land' would seem to be the most exact translation. But if we should adopt it, another ambiguity would be created, and a false notion suggested. Indeed, for a European reader, a pasture is a meadow with abundant grass, which is not at all true of the Palestman mulbir

For a correct understanding of the meaning of the word 'wilderness' in the Bible, one has to remember that there were and are still—nomads in Bible lands. Those people are not addicted to agricultural life, but to the breeding of cattle; they live on the borders of cultivated lands, between these and other regions which are either uninhabitable or practically uninhabited. The territories held by those nomads—called Bedawin in modern times—are not without water and grass; but these indispensable resources, required for the herds, are both scarce, and the tribes of shepherds are compelled to remove their camps from one place to another for feeding and watering their cattle. The mudbar is therefore essentially the ground occupied by nomad tribes; it forms around agricultural districts a zone variable in extension or breadth; sometimes culture wins over uncultivated lands, sometimes these regain spaces formerly tilled and sown. At the boundary itself of those two tracts of land live some populations which two tracts of land live some populations which hold a sort of intermediate position in the progress of civilization: they are half-sedentary, half-shepherds (half-Fellahin, half-Bedavin), and, dwelling still under tents, they cultivate the ground, plough, sow, and reap (cf. Max von Oppenheim, Vom Mittelmeer zum Persischen Golf, 1900, ii. pp. 78-84). Even in the interior of cultivated districts, where villages and towns aviet there are districts, where villages and towns exist, there are frequently patches of land where the soil remains abandoned to itself, without culture, and they offer, therefore, the same character as the exterior zone inhabited by nomads. Those spaces are generally used as pasture-grounds for the cattle, and have also been called midbar. They are found and nave and them tailed matter. They are found even near towns; thus the OT mentions the wildernesses of Gibeon, of Tekoa, of Damascus, of Riblah (MT Diblah, Ezk 6<sup>14</sup>). Besides those local denominations, others occur which apply to peripheric regions: wildernesses of Shur, of Sin, of Sinai, of Paran, of Zin, of Kadesh, of Ethan (or Yam-Suph), of Maon, of Ziph, of Beersheba, of Engedi, of Jeruel, of Beth-aven, of Edom, of Moab, of Kedenoth. Several of these wildernesses as of Kedemoth. Several of these wildernesses, as their names show, cover vast spaces; others, on the contrary, represent quite limited places

One of the most important deserts is the Wilderness of Judah, twenty hours in length and five in breadth, which constitutes, with the Mountain (Har), the South (Negeb), and the Low-Country (Shephelah), the four parts of the territory of that The Wilderness of Judah is the region situated east of the watershed, between this high line and the western shore of the Dead Sea. The wildernesses of Ziph and of Maon are portions of it in the south, as well as those of Engedi and Tekoa in the middle; and finally also, in the north, the rough, barren, and uninhabited district where the road runs from Jerusalem to Jericho (cf. Lk 10<sup>306</sup>.). That wilderness is an uneven, undulating table-land, where conical hills and rocky hillocks arise, where deep ravines are cut between steep walls of rocks; it falls down towards the east—here in gradual declivities, there in sudden and abrupt slopes—in the direction of the Dead Sea, situated 1500 or 2000 feet below. No river or rivulet, no trees, no villages; a soil without vegetation, either sandy or stony, here and there with tation, either sandy or stony, here and there with scarce and meagre grass, which is avidly sought for by small flocks of sheep and goats, belonging to a few miserable camps of black or brown tents. That wilderness was the refuge of David when persecuted by Saul (1 S 22-26); he knew it from the time of his youth, having, when a boy, followed there the herds of his father (16<sup>11</sup> 17<sup>12, 24</sup>). Later on the same region sheltered Judas Maccabæus and his companions (1 Mac 9<sup>23</sup>).

and his companions (1 Mac 9<sup>28</sup>).

The wildernesses mentioned in the Bible are not all as inclement and inhospitable as the Wilderness of Judah. They are sometimes inhabited; they contain wells and cisterns, towns (Jos 15<sup>611</sup>., 1 K 9<sup>18</sup>, 2 Ch 8<sup>4</sup>) and houses (1 K 2<sup>64</sup>), herds of sheep (1 S 17<sup>26</sup>), and pastures (Ps 65<sup>181</sup>.).

The Gospel of John alludes twice to the sojourn of Israel in the wilderness (3<sup>14</sup> Moses lifting the serpent, and 6<sup>51</sup>. <sup>26</sup> the manna). The Synoptics do not mention it: but it is spoken of in the Book of not mention it; but it is spoken of in the Book of Acts, specially in Stephen's discourse (7<sup>26-44</sup>) and in 13<sup>18</sup>, and in 1 Co 10<sup>5</sup> and He 3<sup>5</sup> (quoting Ps 95<sup>5</sup>)

The Wilderness of Judah is named several times in connexion with John the Baptist. His youth, according to Lk 100, was spent 'in the deserts'; that is, certainly, with the keepers of herds, away from towns or villages, in solitude and contempla-

In that respect, as well as in others, John is tion. like Amos, the shepherd of Telcoa. According to the Gospels, 'the deserts' included also the country near Jordan-beyond, that is, east of, the riverwhere John began his ministry, preaching and baptizing (Mt 3<sup>1</sup>, Mk 1<sup>4</sup>, Lk 3<sup>2</sup>; cf. Mt 11<sup>7</sup>, Lk 7<sup>-4</sup>; see artt. Bethabara, John the Baptist, Jordan), and the four Gospels apply to that event the prophecy of Is 40<sup>3</sup> (Mt 3<sup>3</sup>, Mk 1<sup>3</sup>, Lk 3<sup>4</sup>, Jn 1<sup>23</sup>).

Ecclesiastical tradition has not been content with the indications given in the Gospels which connect John the Baptist's life and work with the wilderness: it has connected also his birth with it. The place where Zacharias and Elisabeth dwelt being only vaguely named in Lk 1<sup>30</sup>, it has been identified by the Christians of the Holy Land and the pilgrims, since the time of the Crusades, with a village situated about 4 miles west from Jerusalem; the Arabs call it 'Ain-Karim, but it is known in the language of the Churches as 'St. John in the Desert' or 'St. John in the Mountain.' That place is not in the Wilderness of Judah; its neighbourhood is cultivated and fertile, at least in the sense in which one can use that word when speaking of Judsa. Even if we should suppose that such was the birthplace of John, it would be unjustified to consider it as being 'in the wilderness' (cf. ZDPV xxii. pp. 81-63).

It is also in the wilderness that the Gospel narratives place the scene of the Temptation of our Lord (Mt 4<sup>1</sup>, Mk 1<sup>12</sup>, Lk 4<sup>1</sup>). Since the time of the Crusades, ecclesiastical tradition has contrived to localize that event in a particular, well-defined spot, and has chosen for it the wild and desolate mountain which arises almost vertically above the Fountain of Elisha, west from the oasis of Jericho. A Greek convent, continuation of a very old laura, which was, if not founded, at least developed by Elpidius (ZDPV iii. p. 13), is suspended on the side of that mountain, which has received the name of Mount of the Quarantania (Jebel Karantul), on account of Jesus fasting 40 days. It is, of course, equally impossible to prove or to disprove that this place is the one mentioned in the narratives of the Temptation.

Galilee, and particularly the shores of the Lake of Gennesaret, was at the time of our Lord relatively well peopled: this is proved by the Gospels, and still more explicitly by the testimony of Josephus. There were, however, spaces of land without human habitations, and probably left to the shepherds and their cattle. According to the narratives of the Gospels, several scenes of the Galilæan ministry of Jesus, and some of His teachings, were connected with places of that sort, designated now as 'a desert' or 'a wilderness' designated now as 'a desert' or 'a wilderness' (ξρημος or έρημία), now as 'a desert place' (ξρημος τόπος). We have to mention here (a) the multiplication of loaves (Mt 14<sup>13-21</sup>, Mk 6<sup>20-44</sup>, Lk 9<sup>10-17</sup>, Mt 15<sup>22-28</sup>, Mk 8<sup>1-10</sup>); (b) Jesus withdrawing for prayer (Mk 1<sup>25</sup>, Lk 5<sup>18</sup>), or to avoid the crowd (Mk 1<sup>45</sup>, Lk 4<sup>42</sup>, Jn 11<sup>54</sup>); (c) the demoniac of Gadara (Lk 8<sup>29</sup>); (d) the parable of the Lost Sheep (Lk 15<sup>2-7</sup>), where the 99 sheep remain 'in the wilderness,' whereas the shepherd goes after that which is lost until he finds it. which is lost until he finds it.

WILL.—'Every man,' says Thomas Reid (Works, 1863 ed., p. 530), 'is conscious of a power to determine, in things which he conceives to depend upon his determination. To this power we give the name of Will; and, as it is usual, in the operations of the mind, to give the same name to the power and to the act of that power, the term "Will" is often put to signify the act of determining, which more properly is called volition.' of the freedom of the will see FREE WILL and LIBERTY; and on the human will of Jesus see SOUL, 668b. Our Lord Jesus Christ has given us a perfect example of how our great possession of freedom should be used, has shown us by His own perfect subordination of His will to the will of His Father, that the goal at which we should aim is to have our wills in perfect accord with the will of God, whether it be His will as to our enduring or His will as to our doing. 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless not as I will, but as thou will' Mt (262); 'I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me' (Jn 6<sup>36</sup>). It is our part to seek to have the mind of Christ, and to obey where God would have us to obey, and endure where He would have us to endure.

WIND (ἀνεμος; πνεῦμα only in Jn 36).—'The four winds' (Mt 24<sup>21</sup>, Mk 13<sup>27</sup>) is an expression standing for 'north, south, east, and west,' the winds in Palestine coming mainly from these directions. These winds retain their character, varied only in degree, throughout the year. The north wind is cold; the west, from the sea, moist; the south, warm; and the east, from the desert, dry. This last is very pleasant in the winter months; but in spring and autumn, when it is prevalent, it is exceedingly oppressive, a few hours often causing every living thing to droop. The popular belief that the most violent winds are from the east is not confirmed by the writer's experience of over five years in Galilee. The most memorable storm in that period was from the west. SEA OF GALILEE, p. 591. See, further, W. Ewing.

WINE (οἶνος; once, Ac 213, γλεῦκος).—The climate and soil of Palestine are excellently adapted to and soil of raiestine are excellently adapted to the production of grapes, and from very early times wine has been a common beverage in the country. In the OT it is praised as a source of good cheer to the heavy of heart, as a stimulant for the faint, and as a token of a full, happy, and prosperous life (Pr 316, Ps 10416). The dangers of excessive indulgence are indeed clearly indicated excessive indulgence are indeed clearly indicated. The priest while on duty, and the Nazirite during the currency of his vow, might not touch it (Lv 10°, Nu 63). The sin of drunkenness is presented in revolting colours (Pr 2325, 1s 287.). The Rechabite abstinence from wine, however, arose probably from the nomadic view of the vine as the symbol of the settled life, not from any objection to the use of wine in itself (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 84, 389). In wine in itself (W. R. Smith, Prophets, 84, 389). In the Gospels wine appears with bread as representing ordinary fare (Lk 7<sup>23</sup>); it is drunk on festive occasions (Jn 2<sup>3</sup>), and at religious feasts (Mt 26<sup>29</sup> etc.). Mingled with oil, it is applied to wounds as a healing agent (Lk 10<sup>24</sup>); mingled with myrrh, it is used as a narcotic (Mk 15<sup>23</sup>).

The ancient methods of wine-making persist to the present day. Company the grapes are placed the present day. Commonly the grapes are placed in a large shallow trough, cut in the surface of the rock. The juice is there trodden out, and conducted by a channel to a deeper trough at a lower level. The time of the vintage and wine-treading level. The time of the vintage and while-treating is one of great joyfulness among the people, their labours being enlivened by the singing of songs, and rhythmic clapping of the hands. Fermentation sets in quickly. The first, or what the Jews called the 'tumultuous' stage, might be passed in four days, during which the wine remained in the trough, or vat, if possible. It was then put into earthenware jars which had been lined with pitch, or, if it were to be sent to a distance, into 'bottles, where the process was completed. In about three months the wine was fit for use.

Where the soil was deep, a press was 'digged' in the earth (Mt 21<sup>23</sup> etc.). This, built round with masonry, and carefully cemented, received the juice expressed in a wooden structure set on the surface.

The 'bottles' are partially tanned goat-skins. The apertures where legs and tail have been severed are sewn up, leaving only that at the neck, which is firmly tied when the skin is filled. The wine in the first stage of fermentation, if tied in wine in the first stage of fermentation, if tied in the skins, would, by reason of the gas generated, burst them. When the 'tunultuous' stage is passed, the new 'bottle' yields sufficiently to permit completion of the process. 'Bottles' once stretched in this way had no further powers of distention, and if used again for the same purpose would, of course, burst (Mt 9<sup>17</sup> etc.). Different qualities of wine were distinguished (In 2<sup>10</sup>), probably indicated as they are still by (Jn 2<sup>10</sup>), probably indicated, as they are still, by the localities where they are produced. The 'new wine' of Ac 2<sup>12</sup> (lit. 'sweet wine') was probably 'the wine made from the drip of the grapes before the clusters are trodden in the wine-press-stronger than the thin sour wines used as daily beverages' (Lindsay, Acts, in lor.). The modern 'sweet wine' is made from the white or green grapes, the juice being slightly boiled.

There is nothing known in the East of anything called 'wine' which is unfermented. Pharaoh's butler pressed grapes into his master's cup (Gn 4011). 'In a text found at Edfu, it is said that grapes squeezed into water formed a refreshing beverage which was drunk by the king' (Driver, Genesis, in loc.). This possibly corresponds to the Spanish drink made by squeezing grapes not quite ripe into water. But it is never called 'wine.' The γλεῦκος of Ac 218 was certainly fermented. Apart from the fact that the vintage was eight months passed, which put the keeping of unfermented grape juice out of the question, it was alleged as the cause of drunkenness by those who must have known its character. The wine used by the Jews in Palestine -people most conservative in their religious custons—at the Passover, is of the ordinary kind. And there is no trace of any tradition among them of a change having been introduced. Their attitude towards the drinker of unfermented grape juice may be gathered from the saying in Piric Aboth (iv. 28), 'He who learns from the young, to what is he like? to one that eats unripe grapes, and drinks wine from his vat.'

While in the NT wine is plainly regarded as good, and its medicinal value is recognized (1 Ti 5<sup>23</sup>), there is no blindness to the danger attached to its abuse (see, e.g., Eph 5<sup>18</sup>, 1 Ti 3<sup>8</sup>, Tit 2<sup>2</sup>). The question of total abstinence, like that of slavery, had not yet been raised. No argument for total abstinence can be built on the significance of terms used for 'wine' in Scripture. But 'the Apostle Paul has stated the case for total abstinence in Ro 14 in a way that does not need the treacherous aid of doubtful exegesis for its support' (DB. s.c. 'Food'). WINTER (χειμών, Mt 2420, Mk 1318, Jn 1022).—This is the time of cold and rain-storms. The modern Arab. name, csh-shitta', means literally 'the rain.' It is the season in which the rain supply of the year falls: it lasts roughly for seven months, from October till April inclusive, thus including the part of the year which we call spring (see SUMMER).

While in the deeper parts of the Jordan Valley it is never very cold, the raw air breeds many discomforts in the rainy season. On the higher lands, however, the cold is often intense, snow lying at times—e.g. in Jerusalem—to a depth of some inches. The rain moistens the soil, hard baked by the summer sun. In a land where the science of road-making is practically unknown, the paths go swiftly to mud, so that travel in winter is always toilsome, and not seldom perilous. W. EWING.

i. THE BIBLICAL CONCEPTION.—In Biblical language the term 'wisdom' (OT πρηη hokhmāh, LXX and NT σοφία, rarely φρόνησις (Lk 117, Eph 18), or σύνεσις (Lk 247, Eph 34)), is applied (A) to a human,

(B) to a Divine attribute.

A. Under the former head is included.—1. The type of thought illustrated in the school of religiophilosophical thinkers contemporary with and later than the prophets, rivalled and ultimately displaced by the scribes. Thus the designation of Mt 23<sup>24</sup>, 'prophets and wise men and scribes,' is seen to be historically correct, as against the modified form of Lk 11<sup>20</sup> ('prophets and apostles'; cf. 1 Th 2<sup>15</sup>, Eph 2<sup>20</sup> etc.), the representatives of these schools of Lewish thought being regarded as commissioned of Jewish thought being regarded as commissioned by and endowed with the Divine Spirit. 2. In a derived sense the writings of these inspired men (ή πανάρετος σοφία, applied by Hegesippus and Pales-(† maráperos roopia, applied by Hegesippus and Palestinian writers generally to the group Pr.-Wisd. of Sol.; see Eus. HE IV. xxii. 8, 'Nicene and post-Nicene Fathers' [ed. Schaff-Wace], with note by McGiffert), regarded as utterances of the Spirit of God; 'the Wisdom of God saith' (Lk 11'')= 'the Holy Ghost saith' (He 3')='the Spirit (of apocalyptic prophecy) saith' (1 Ti 4', perhaps referring to Jannes and Jambres, 2 Ti 3'').

B. The designation 'Wisdom of God,' or simply

'Wisdom,' is sometimes applied to the Spirit of God as manifest in creation and redemption, in the illumination of the mind and regeneration of the soul.

1. In the Hokhmāh, or Wisdom literature, this is the habitual designation of the Divine Spirit, especially conceived as manifesting the redeeming love of God, which goes forth to seek and save the erring (Wis 1<sup>5</sup> 7<sup>22-28</sup>). Personification of Wisdom (Job 28, Pr 8), under the later speculative influence of Stoic metaphysics, passes imperceptibly into hypostatization and a Logos-doctrine, cosmological as well as soteriological (Wisdom=the Metathron, Wis 94.10; cf. Sir 24, Wis 724.). In Philo the terms 'Wisdom' and 'Logos' are practically equivalent, the Stoic term naturally tending among Greek readers to displace the Hebrew. Contemporane averted ously, under the mythologizing influence exerted through apocalyptic literature, the redemptive mission of Wisdom (Wis 9<sup>17t</sup>.) develops into an unmistakable avatar doctrine, wherein Wisdom becomes incarnate, and dwells among men (Bar 387, cf. Oxyrh. Frqts. Log. iii.), or even descends to the underworld to 'visit all that sleep, and shine upon all that hope in the Lord' (Sir 24<sup>32</sup> Lat.; cf. pseudo-Isaiah, ap. Iren. Hær. III. xx. 4, and Eph 5<sup>14</sup>). Rejected by men, she ascends again to her seat in heaven (Enoch xlii. 1),* whence she returns to be poured out upon the elect in the Messianic age (xlix. 1). The mythologizing tendency was strongly reacted against by the scribes, especially in the period of Akiba, during the rivalry of Synagogue and Church in Palestine (A.D. 70-135). On the Jewish side, from this time forward, all personifi-cations of the Divine Wisdom were rigidly restricted in their application to the Mosaic Torah (Sir 24<sup>22-27</sup>, Bar 4<sup>1</sup>, Pirke Aboth, iii. 14, vi. 10). We even find later readings in Jewish texts altering hokhmāh to tôrāh (σοφία to rόμος). In general, after the schism of the Nazarenes, speculative thought (doctrine of the Merkabah) is rigorously suppressed.

2. On the Christian side Wisdom speculation continued to develop in both the cosmological and the soteriological directions, with the Pauline Epistles as a basis. In the Johannine literature the Greek term 'Logos' is adopted, though the Wisdom doctrine itself continues Hebrew; but in the 2nd cent. Fathers, as in Philo, 'Wisdom' and 'Logos' are interchangeable and equivalent. Both designate the Spirit of God incarnate in Christ. The influence of mystery myths, already traceable in pre-Christian apocalypse, becomes more pronounced, Gnostic speculations becoming completely mythological. In these Wisdom ( $\hat{\eta} \sum \phi \hat{\rho} a$ , or Achamoth = hokhmāh) is the feminine or passive principle in the scheme of redemption,  $\Sigma \omega r \eta_p$  the active. The present discussion will confine itself to the NT use of the two conceptions of wisdom:
(A) as the inspired message of God through the 'wise men' (hākhāmim); (B) as the Divine Spirit itself, resident in Jesus, and manifested in His life as well as in His teaching. For the history of Wisdom as the Hebrew philosophy, and as a hypo-stasis equivalent to the Stoic Logos, the reader is referred to the artt. 'Wisdom,' 'Wisdom Literature,' 'Wisdom, Book of,' in Hastings' DB and in

*The note of R. H. Charles on this passage of Enoch is too significant to be omitted: 'The praise of wisdom was a favourite theme. Wisdom was regarded as having her dwelling-place in heaven (1xxxiv. 3, Job 981-14. 20-24, Bar 3:29, Ecclus 24*), and as coming to earth and desiring to make her abode with men Pr. 1207. 28f. 91-19, Ecclus 24*; but as men refused to receive her (cf. civ. 5), she returned to heaven. But in the Messianic times she will return, and will be poured out as water in abundance, xlix. 1, and the thirsty will drink to the full of wisdom, xlvii. 1; she will be bestowed on the elect, v. 8, xci. 10; cf. Apoc. Bar. xliv. 14, 4 Exra viii. 52; and the spirit of wisdom will abide in the Messiah, the Elect One, xlix. 3.' What is here said of the outpouring of the spirit of wisdom is parallel to Ac 216x. of the spirit of prophecy (cf. Nu 1129) and to the agraphon: 'Et factum est cum ascendisset dominus de aqua, descendit fons omnis Spiritus Sancti, et requievit super eum,' eto.

ii. NT USE.—1. A study of the use of the word σοφία, and its cognates in the Gospels, shows it to be, in some sense, distinctive of the Lukan writ-ment with the Spirit. It occurs twice in Mt. (1119 12<sup>22</sup>), both occurrences being in passages verbally identical with Lk., and in a less original form. In Lk.-Acts it occurs 10 times; but the Lukan use is specially noteworthy, because endowment with the Spirit of God is here habitually spoken of, whether in the case of Jesus, of His forerunners, or of His successors, as the  $\chi d\rho_0 \sigma \mu a$  of 'wisdom.' So of Jesus (Lk  $2^{40.52}$ , cf.  $2^{47}$  obveous and  $4^{22}$   $\lambda \delta \gamma \omega \chi d\rho_0 \tau \sigma s$ ), of the endowment of the Twelve with the Spirit (2115), of the Seven (Ac 63), of Stephen (610), of Joseph (710), of Moses (722). In the Fourth Gospel the conception of the endowment of Jesus with the spirit of wisdom is supplanted by that of an incar-nation of the Logos. The word σοφία and its cognates are wholly wanting.

2. With this Gospel use should be compared that of the NT elsewhere. In the Pauline Epistles the word occurs 16 times in the passage 1 Co 117-319, wherein St. Paul contrasts 'the wisdom of God,' which endows those who 'have the mind of Christ' with 'the wisdom of this world'; and 9 times in the twin Epistles (Eph.-Col.), written to oppose a 'philosophy and vain deceit' (Eph 414' wiles of error') by means of the Divine gitt of 'a spirit of wisdom and understanding in the mystery of the Divine will.' It is used by St. Paul in but three other instances, two of which (1 Co 128, 2 Co 112) are directly related to the group first mentioned, while the third occurs in the doxology Ro 1133. The xaprace of wisdom claimed by St. Paul (1 Co 117-216, Eph 33-11, cf. 1 Co 128) is conceded to his letters in 2 P 315.

3. The only other NT employments of the word or of the

iii. Use in the discourses of Jesus.—The discourses of Jesus furnish a meagre but trustworthy starting point for a history of the term in its Christological development. Among these discourses we cannot venture to reckon the saying Lk  $21^{15}$  (=  $12^{11}$  = Mt  $10^{196}$  - Mk  $13^{11}$  = Jn  $15^{266}$ .), since the parallels make it probable that στόμα καί σοφία (cf. Lk 24 prudentiam et os, cod. e.) is only the characteristic Lukan mode of expressing the promise of the Paraclete. All other occurrences of the word or connected idea in the discourses stand the word or connected idea in the discourses stand more or less closely related with one of two incidents: (1) Jesus' denunciation of the faithless generation which rejected for opposite reasons both the Baptist's mission and His own (Mt 11), or (2) His denunciation of the scribes who blasphemed the Spirit of God whereby He wrought, demanding a sign from heaven (Mt 12<sup>22-18</sup>). These discourses are variously distributed in our First and Third Gospels (Mt 112-30 1222-45 2126-22 2334-69 and Lk 7<sup>18-36</sup> 10<sup>13-16</sup>. 21f. 11<sup>24-26</sup>. 29-31. 49-51), but have in common a close connexion in thought and a resemblance of language in exceptional degree as between the two canonical reporters. In these between the two canonical reporters. In these two groups of discourses, therefore, must be found, if anywhere, the basis in Jesus' own utterances for the subsequent application in Christology of the conception of the Divine Wisdom.

iv. MATTHEAN CONNEXIONS OF THE TWO GROUPS OF SAYINGS.—1. The Matthean context of group (1) starts from the question of John's disciples. This is made the occasion by Jesus of a comparison of unrepentant Israel to children who are pleased with neither the mournful nor the gay melodies of their playmates. His hearers had been displeased at the asceticism of John, and are equally so with the genial life of the 'Friend of publicans and sinners.' As against this rejection by the self-righteous of the message of repentance and forgiveness, 'Wisdom's children' (here those who had repented at the preaching of John, cf. 21<sup>31</sup>, Lk 7<sup>26t</sup>.) afford the justification of her methods (Mt 11<sup>2-19</sup>). In Mt. the discourse continues with the denunciation of 'the cities wherein meet of his mighty were done's presented. most of his mighty works were done,' a paragraph which is perhaps accountable for the reading  $\ell \rho \gamma a$  in some MSS for  $\tau \ell \kappa \nu a$  in v.<sup>19</sup>. These verses (Mt  $11^{20-24}$ ) are otherwise placed by Lk.; but those which follow (Mt  $11^{20-2}$  = Lk  $10^{211}$ .) again relate to the wisdom of Jesus which is delivered to Him the wisdom of Jesus which is derivered to him (παρεδόθη μοι) by His Father (in contrast with the παράδοσις of the scribes, Mk 713), and, though hid from the wise, is revealed to the 'little onea.' This in turn introduces in Mt 1125-30 an invitation closely resembling those placed in the mouth of the Diving Windom in the literature of this class the Divine Wisdom in the literature of this class (cf. Sir 51266. 628 and Oxyrhynchus Log. iii. [iv.]). This closes the chapter and the discourse.

2. In Mt 12<sup>38-45</sup> substantially the same subject is resumed, but it is now a propos of the blasphemy of the scribes against the Holy Spirit in ascribing Jesus' exorcisms to Beelzebub (12<sup>22-37</sup>), the interven-Jesus' exorcisms to Beelzebub ( $12^{2-3}$ ), the intervening material ( $12^{1-21}$ ) comprising the two Sabbath incidents of Mk  $2^{23}$ -3. In this further denunciation, not of the scribes but still of 'this evil and adulterous generation,' Jesus declares that it will fare worse than the Ninevites; for, while these repented at the warning of Jonah, this generation has raisetted a greater women of the theorem. the rejected a greater warning (i.e. the Baptist's; cf. 11<sup>11-14</sup> and Bacon, Scrmon on the Mount, App. C. iv. v. pp. 216-231). It is condemned also by the Queen of the South, because she came to hear 'the wisdom of Solomon,' whereas this generation has rejected a more gracious appeal (πλείον='a greater matter,' i.e. Jesus' message of forgiveness conceived as the 'wisdom' of God). A concluding parable (Mt 12<sup>13-45</sup> = Lk 11<sup>24-25</sup>) likens 'this evil generation, with its Pharisaic manin purifica, to a house swept and garnished which becomes the abode of demons, because inhospitable to the Spirit of God. It is highly noteworthy that in both groups the condemnation is uttered by Jesus for rejection of the Spirit of God, which in the case of the discourse anent the Baptist is assumed to be manifest in Jesus' message of forgiveness, in the case of the blasphemy of the scribes in His healing power. The significance of the use of the term 'wisdom' in both cases (Mt 1119 1221) for the forgiving love, is made more apparent by the contrast in both instances with the Baptist's harsher message of warning against 'the wrath to come.' This is manifest from the figures of wailing versus piping, mourning versus dancing, fasting versus feasting, preaching of Jonah versus wisdom of Solomon.

v. Lukan connexions of the two groups.—

♠ further discourse, correctly connected in Lk 11<sup>40-31</sup> with group (2) (in Mt 23<sup>3-42</sup> incorrectly attached to Mk 12<sup>30-40</sup> — Mt 23<sup>1-12</sup>) carries to its logical conclusion the denunciation of the scribes ing now directly in the name of 'the wisdom of God' (Lk 11"), Jeans predicts their impending fate, and in the Matthean form (which properly includes the pathetic appeal to Jerusalem, separated from it in Lk [Mt 23" " - Lk 13" b, the for-saking of 'your house' by God's Spirit. Not only liave we throughout this context the characteristic forms and modes of expression of the Wisdom literature, but the final warning is expressly initroduced as an utterance of the wisdom of God's open roo seeds, by which should be understood not the specific title of an individual writing of this literary category, but the entire canon of 'Wisdom' writings, inclusive of the lost work from which the extract is made. The following conaderations will make this clear :-

1. The continuation of the previous line of thought is apparent from the aliasion to the fate of tod's messengers with Mt 23 3-37. Lk 118-5 13-8. cf Mt 1200 Lk 118-13, to the vain plea of the spirit [Wisdom] (with Mt 237-30. Lk 118-25), and to the house left desolate (with Mt 235-32. Lk 118-25), and to the house left desolate (with Mt 235-32. Lk 118-25), and to the house left desolate (with Mt 235-32. Lk 118-25), and to the house left desolate (with Mt 235-32. Lk 118-25), and to the house left desolate (with Mt 235-32. Lk 118-26). Lk 118-26. Lk 118-26.

It thus appears that in the two groups of discourse-material principally represented in Mt II and 12 and Lk 7 and II we have mextricably intermingled (1) sayings of Jesus wherein His own gracious mission was set over against the harsher warning of the Baptist as the message of the Divine Wisdom; and (2) extracts in defence of His beneficent works, from the actual Wisdom literature, these extracts having been embodied along with His words of denunciation of the scribes, either by Himself or in the subsequent development of Exangelic tradition. To draw the line with precision between authentic utterances of Jesus, and material subsequently adapted from the Wisdom literature because pronounced by the wisdom of God' (Mt 112-22) surpasses the powers of criticism; but the endeavour is the more needless because the really significant fact is that Jesus' actual teaching, at least in the form given it by the source here employed in common by Mt and Lk, was so closely allied to the ideas of this Wisdom literature as to permit of intermingling at an extremely early date. A later example of the process of adapta-tion is furnished by the Oxyrhynchus papyrus which puts in the mouth of Jesus the characteristic Wisdom utterance: 'I stood in the midst of the world, and in the flesh was I seen of them (cf. Bar 330), and I found all men drunken, and none found I athirst among them, and my soul grieveth over the sons of men because they are blind in their heart' (Oxyrh. Log. III.).

2. Other elements of discourse-material from the Third Gospel and Acts may be clearly traced to a source of the same Wisdom type, if not the same composition. (a) In particular, the wisdom of Solomon, especially as exhibited in the hedonistic Epicureanism of Ecclesiastes, is pointedly contrasted with a higher wisdom in the great discourse on the true riches of Lk 12<sup>13-34</sup>, part of which is taken up in Mt 6<sup>18-34</sup>. The polemic against Ec 2 in 12<sup>13-21</sup> becomes tenfold more pointed as the decourse proceeds to compare the beauty of the neither store-chamber nor barn' (cf. v.<sup>20</sup>) with 'Solomon in all his glory' (cf. Ec 1<sup>12-10</sup> 2<sup>1-20</sup>). The subject of the discourse ("wherein life consists," vv. 16 22) is as distinctive of Hebrew Wisdom literature as the form and phraseology.

(b) To the same original context must be reckoned the greater part of Lk 16, the material of which is peculiar to Luke. The 'wisdom' of the unrighteous steward in the use of 'the mammon of unrighteousness' is a subject manifestly in close relation to the use of riches commended in 12<sup>25-34</sup>. the affinity extending even to the phraseology (with 16° 'riches that fail' of 12" 'treasure that (with 16° 'riches that fail' of 12° 'treasure that faileth not'). The combination of the two, therefore, in Mt 6° 's', a propos of the heavenly recompense (Mt 6° 's'), probably reflects a real connexion of 1k 12° 's' with 16° 's' in the source.

(c) A kindred subject having a similar develop-ment in Lk., but otherwise only scantily repre-sented in the Go-pels, is that of dependence on the Divine bounty in answer to prayer (Lk 11<sup>1-13</sup>), which can hardly be dissociated from the companion parables (11<sup>5-8</sup> and 18<sup>1-8</sup>). The bare and wholly disconnected fragment taken up in Mt 7<sup>7-11</sup> is as madequate to represent this exquisite group as is Mt 6<sup>19-34</sup> if bereft of the parables on the Foolish Rich Man and the Shrewd Steward. Once more, it is the Ep. of James that supplies an ocho of the same spirit (cf. 13-6, 17 425, 513-14).

It is clear that the method here applied may be extended to much of the special discourse-material of Lk., including perhaps some elements of Acts (on Solomon in Ac 7*** see Yate Bircadonnial Contributions, 1901, p. 271 f.). It is sufficent for the present to indicate that a large element of our Third Gospel is thus characterized.

vi. Wisdom utterances represent a special TYPE OF COMPLE TRADITIONS.—The question of the relation of the Wisdom discourses to the recognized Gospel sources is one which inevitably suggests itself as soon as the fact is recognized that they are characterized by a peculiar and distinctive point of view. It becomes our duty, accordingly, to trace at least the outline of an answer.

1. The discourse-material of Mt 11-12 falls outside the pentad characterized by the colophon saidly different of the colophon and sydners of the colophon and syd

2. Besides being separated by narrative-material from these groups, Mi 11-12 differ from them in the fact of their relation to the narrative, from which they are inseparable, and in the degree of similarity in their language to the Lukan parallels. As against the groups of logia which have not, and from their character do not require, a narrative setting, the discourse of Mt 11 not only relates the coming of the Baptist's disciples, but presupposes an account of Jesus' works of healing, and even requires us to suppose the reader somewhere in-formed of what had given rise to the taunt 'Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners.' The same applies to the discourse in defence of Jesus' exorcism 'by the Spirit of God.' This indispensable narrativeelement is always supplied more fully and in better connexion by Lk., in some cases by Lk. alone (Lk 11<sup>16</sup>, 12<sup>13-21</sup>).

3. The similarity of language to the Lukan parallels is here very exceptional, reaching the degree of verbal identity for whole sentences, and positively requiring the use of the same written Greek source.

4. This marked difference in the degree of resemblance serves to connect other non-Markan elements of Mt., such as 3<sup>1</sup>-4<sup>11</sup> 8<sup>5-13</sup>. <sup>18-22</sup>, which are again found to fall outside the Matthwan pentad, to differ in content and point of view from the Logian source, and to be at once more complete and for the most part more authentic in detail in Luke than in Matthew. Linguistic peculiarities in several instances prove the dependence of Mt. in these portions. Thus 'Ιερουσαλήμ is used by Lk. 68 times against 3 (5?) employments of 'Ιεροσόλυμα. The latter form on the contrary is invariably em-The latter form on the contrary is invariably employed in Mt., Mk., and Jn., except thrice in Mt 23<sup>37</sup> = Lk 13<sup>34</sup>. βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ is systematically changed by Mt. to τῶν οὐρανῶν. There are but four exceptions: Mt 19<sup>24</sup> (=Mk 10<sup>25</sup>) and 12<sup>28</sup> 21<sup>31.43</sup> (cf. Lk 7<sup>29</sup> 11<sup>20</sup>).

vii. Relation to narrative elements of Synoptic tradition.—Although our First and to a less extent our Third Evangelist both derive the main framework of their narrative from our the main framework of their narrative from our Second, this Second itself is not wanting in evidences of dependence on the source to which we have traced the Wisdom chapters of Mt. and Luke.

have traced the Wisdom chapters of Mt. and Luke.

1. This relation appears in the description of the Baptist as Elias (Mk  $1^{2.5.6}$ ; \* cf. Lk  $7^{24f. 53}$ , Mt  $11^{14}$ , 2 K  $1^{8}$ ); of the Temptation (Mk  $1^{13}$ , the  $d\gamma\gamma\epsilon\lambda\alpha$  and  $\theta\eta\rho\iota\alpha$  coming from Ps  $91^{11-13}$  quoted in Lk  $4^{10f.}$ ); of Jesus as 'eating and drinking' while the disciples of the Baptist were fasting, and as 'a friend of publicans and sinners' (Mk  $2^{18-22.13-17}$ ; cf. Lk  $7^{33f.}$ ); of the blasphemy of the scribes (Mk  $3^{22-33}$ ; cf. Lk  $11^{14-29}$ ), and perhaps of the Transfiguration (Mk  $9^{2-13}$ ; cf. Lk  $9^{28-39}$ ). In all these passages of Mk. and in other loosely connected material  $(9^{38-49}$  Lk  $9^{49f.}$   $12^{41-44}$  Lk  $2^{11-4}$ ) the context of Lk. gives more or less conclusive evidence text of Lk. gives more or less conclusive evidence of priority. It is but reasonable to suppose that other Markan narratives such as 61-6 may also have been derived hence, though the present Lukan form has been affected by Mk.

2. Of the connexion of the narrative-elements peculiar to Lk. with the source thus characterized it is hardly needful to speak. The common point of view of this material, presenting Jesus as the friend and champion of the lowly, from His child-band in the many pulsars of the lowly, and the characteristics of the second of the lower when the second of the lower when the second of the second of the lower when the second of t hood in the manger, welcomed by shepherds, to His acceptance by the thief on the cross, is well known. Nor can such narratives as that of the repentant harlot (Lk 7<sup>36-36</sup>) be separated without violence from the discourse context. It is only in Mt. and Mk. that Lk 7<sup>1-10</sup> and 21<sup>1-4</sup> find themselves on a

viii. Conclusions as to proto-Lukan source. Admitting the precarious character of all attempts at extricating the Synoptic sources, and the probable development of the Antiochian (?) tradition between the period of its employment by Mk. and Mt. and its ultimate incorporation by Mk. and Mt. and its ultimate incorporation by Lk., enough remains to justify the following inference. A type of Gospel tradition grew up (at Antioch?) intermediate between those to which tradition attaches the names respectively of 'Matthew' and 'John,' and containing the  $\hbar$   $\lambda\epsilon\chi\theta\ell\nu\tau a$   $\hbar$   $\pi\rho\alpha\chi\theta\ell\nu\tau a$  traditionally ascribed to the preaching of Peter. The Matthean tradition is especially connected both by the unanimous testimony of antiquity and by internal evidence with Jerusalem. It takes as its method the agglutination of the logia of Jesus into a five-fold new Torah, as 'commandments given by the Lord to the faith.' This agrees with the legalistic tendencies of the Palestinian Church and the methods of the Synagogue as illustrated, e.g., in the Pirke Aboth (cf. the Oxyrhynchus Logia). Besides the halachic type of Gospel tradition the earliest testimony recognizes a haggadic, of which Peter is the authoritative source. seems to have had two branches, the earlier (Mk.) connected by tradition and internal evidences with Rome, the later (Jn.) with Ephesus, both almost as wholly preoccupied with the doctrine of the Person of Christ as the Pauline Epistles, and appealing to the drama of the Ministry and Passion for proof of the Divine sonship of Jesus. In the earlier (Mk.), connexion with the Petrine tradition is still close. In the later (Jn.), Pauline Logos-doctrine wholly dominates. Midway between these two types of Gospel tradition, the Hebrew and the Graco-Roman, is developed that which tradi-Graco-Roman, is developed that which tradition credibly associates with the name of Luke at Antioch. Combining both sayings and doings (ηρξανο ποιείν τε καὶ διδάσκειν, Ac 1¹) in juster proportion than Mk., it finds in the history, as exhibited in both elements, a manifestation of the Spirit of God in terms of the Lowish Windows Spirit of God in terms of the Jewish Wisdom-As our First canonical Evangelist presents as the opening scene of the ministry the new Lawgiver on the Mount of Beatitudes, so our Third Lawgiver on the Mount of Beatitudes, so our Third presents the scene in the synagogue of Nazareth where the 'words of grace' uttered by the bearer of 'the Spirit of the Lord God' are rejected by His own people, the tragedy of the Divine Wisdom. The theme is constant, but is developed alike in message of grace and deed of mercy. The whole career of Jesus is a manifestation of 'the power of God and the wisdom of God.' Analysis of the governors of canonical Lk. Acts reveals no difference sources of canonical Lk.-Acts reveals no difference in this fundamental point of view. From the beginning, as in the 5th cent., the Antioch school is historical, and its historical sources admittedly include, in Acts, if not in the Gospel, the oldest narrative of the NT. By the standard of internal evidence its tradition is more markedly Petrine than Mk.; its Christology roots itself, like the Pauline, but with less of the Hellenic speculative development, in that broadest, most humanitarian, most tolerant school of Hebrew thought, the followers and exponents of 'all-virtuous Wisdom.'

ix. WISDOM SPECULATION IN THE DEVELOP-MENT OF CHRISTOLOGY.—The conception of Wisdom as affecting Synoptic tradition involves such literary analysis of the source as the foregoing. As affecting the doctrine of the Person of Christ it involves at least a passing glance at the Pauline Christology, the link between Synoptic and Johannine doctrine.

1. The Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul stands in unmistakably close relation, as regards its ante-cedents, with the Wisdom literature; and, as respects its subsequent development, with the Johannine Logos-doctrine. St. Paul's indebtedness to

* Note especially the rare form iola found only in Lk 733.34 107 and 2230. In all the other 55 occurrences of the verb in the NT, including 10 in Mark and 9 of Lk.'s own, the regular form iola is used.

Store philosophy and ethics is set forth by no less a master than Lightfoot ('St. Paul and Seneca' in Com. on Phil ) Recent demonstrations of his much more extensive and direct dependence on the Wisdom literature, especially the Book of Wisdom (Internat. Crit. Com. on Romans, by Sanday and Headlam, p. 51; cf. Grafe, 'Das Verluitinus der paulinischen Schriften zur Sapientia Salomonis' in Th. Abh C. c. Weissacker generalmet), should by now have made it plain that Storeism comes to St. Paul mainly through Jewish channels. Again, since it is certain that St. Paul both by tempera ment and by experience was more apocalyptist than scribe, it should not have been overlooked that he has advanced, however briefly, his own de uson on the most point, whether the complete manifestation of the Divine Wisdom is simply the Torah of Moses (so the scribes on the basis of Dt 46-6), or whether it is the living Spirit of God sent forth in human form. Ro 104-6 and Bar 39 4! (especially 3<sup>28</sup>-) contain contemporary and rival interpretations of Dt 30<sup>12-13</sup>. By St. Paul's interpretation 'the word' (of revelation) is nothing more or less than 'Christ' as pre-existent spirit, the same Wislom which, 'because she was the artificer of all things,' passing into the soul of Solomon gave him 'an unerring knowledge of the things that are, to know the constitution of the world, etc. (Wis 7<sup>11-23</sup>), the same 'mind of Christ' by possession of which Christians have similar knowledge of the purposes of the Creator, just as A man's own consciousness gives him knowledge of his private designs (1 Co 28-16; see Master). Definite identification is thus made by St. Paul in this and many other passages between the Divine Spirit of Wisdom, through which, accord-ing to 'Wisdom,' God created the world, and the pre-existent Christ. Even the avatar doctrine of the descent and ascent of Wisdom (see references above, i. 1) is unmistakably adopted by St. Paul partly in opposition to, partly in rivalry with, the widespread conceptions of mystery religion (see MYSTERY). But just as a study of the Pauline ethics will show that its Stoic elements have been subsumed under the Christian principle of altruistic service (Eph 5th, Ph 2t-13), so it should be recognized that the Pauline Logos doctrine, while clearly incorporating in Eph 4th a quant mythological interpretation of Ps 68th, rests upon an authentic teaching of Jesus. According to St. Paul. Ps 68 sets forth the descent, conflict with the hostile powers, triumph and ascent of the Divine Spirit (cf. Col. 2<sup>18</sup>, 1 P 3<sup>19</sup>) after releasing the captives of Death (cf. 1 (o 15<sup>-26</sup>.). But Eph 4<sup>5-19</sup>, when compared with the earlier and later related passages concerning the avatar of Wisdom (Bacon, Story of St. Paul, p. 316 ff.), will be seen in some sense to rest upon the parable of Jesus concerning the spoiling of the Strong Man armed, by the Stronger than he (i.e. the Spirit of God operative in Jesus, Mt 1229). We find it, in fact, habitually applied in this sense by the Fathers (Apollinaris, frag. 2 in Pasch Chron., Heads against Caus, vii; cf. Huydekoper, Works, vol. ii., 'Christ's Mission to the Underworld'). Thus the Pauline Wisdom or Logos-doctrine of a pre-existent, spiritual Christ is firmly rooted in the authentic teaching of Jesus Himself To Jesus also the power of God and Himself To Jesus also 'the power of God and the wisdom of God,' were exhibited in His own nighty works and God-given teaching, and were a sign to His generation (Mt 11-24 1228-44), cf. 1 Co

2. Johannine and Patriate Christology (a) It matters little that after St. Paul the Wisdomdoctrine should have been rebaptized by the Greek title of Logos, perhaps under the influence of Philo, perhaps as a concession to a Greek speaking Church. Even in the Fourth Gospel the basic conception remains Hebrew and Pauline. Sanday as a student of Johannine thought, Sabatier as a student of l'auline, concur in admitting the identity of doctrine under the diverse terminology.

(b) In the Fourth Cospel the standpoint of the Evangelist is purely and simply the theological. He depicts the self-manifestation of the Divine Wisdom or Logos as incarnate in Jesus by word and deed. Her 'dwelling among men' (1<sup>15-16</sup>; cf. Enoch 42<sup>2</sup>), rejection and apotheosis (20<sup>17</sup>) is his Enoch 42°), rejection and apotheosis (20°) is his theme. It is characteristic that here, as in the Wisdom literature in general, Wisdom is made to 'praise herself' (Sir 24°). The incarnate Logos preaches Hinself; His seven parables are seven 'I am's, His seven mighty works manifest His own glory (Jn 2°). In Jn 7° Jesus even quotes again an unknown 'scripture' which by all analogy is drawn from the Wisdom literature (cf. Sir 24° (Inpplied in vv. 5° 7°), by analogy with fire rivers, to the live books of the Torah). Enoch 48° 49°, and for Rabbinic interpretation in the scribal sense, Emck Hammelich, 196°, on Is 12°, 'The waters are nothing else than the Torah, and the waters of salvation nothing else than the Torah of Messiah,' Weber, Lehre d. Tolm. p. 360 f.; cf. also I Co 10° and Orych. Log 111.). and Orych Log III.).
(c) The Wasion utterance Mt 11200, may be regarded as marking the transition-point between the Synoptic and Johannine representations of Jesus' teaching. Not its doctrine alone, nor its mysticism, paralleling 1 Co 2 (see Mystery), but the very form of its utterance is thus seen to be characteristic; for the Wisdom of God habitually speaks in the first person. Herein the discourses of the Fourth Gospel are as close to the spirit of the Wisdom literature as its Logos doctrine is close to the Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul. In the development of Gospel literature the presentation of Jesus' career and teaching as the manifestation of the Divine Wisdom takes a place analogous to that of the Wisdom-doctrine of St. Paul in the development of Christology.

WIRDOM OF CHRIST.—1. Christ, being God and WISDOM OF CHRIST .- 1. Christ, being God and man, possessed naturally two distinct kinds of wisdom Divine wisdom and human wisdom. The former, as part of the totality of the Divine attributes (16 πληρωμα της θεότητος), He necessarily possessed from eternity, and, according to Pauline teaching, He continued to possess it, in spite of His structs, or self emptying (Ph 27), even after His Incarnation (Col 11 2, cf 25). The continued possession by the Incarnate Logos of the fulness of the Divine wisdom is no isolated doctrine, but is necessarily involved in the Logos-Christology of St. Paul and St. John, according to which Father does not create and sustain the world directly, but mediately through the Logos, who is the Creator (Jn 1817, Eph 38, Col 18, He 18, the Life (Jn 18), and the Light (v.") of the world, the cause of its rational order, and the principle of its coherence and subsistence (Col 117). Cosmical functions of such a kind as this, assigned to the Logos in accordance with His essential nature and position in the Godhead, cannot be supposed to have been laid aside at the Incarnation, and therefore the limitations of Christ's knowledge, which the Synoptic Gospels recognize, either must be attributed to His manhood, or else it must be supposed that in the historical Christ were two centres of Divine consciousness—an unlimited one, in which He knew all things, and a limited one, in which He condescended to be ignorant of certain things. The latter view, which is based on an ultra-literal interpretation of Mk 13<sup>32</sup>, postulates three different kinds of wisdom in Christ—an unlimited Divine wisdom, a limited Divine wisdom, and a human wisdom. This scheme appears to us unnecessarily complicated. The 'ignorance' of Mk 1332, although ascribed to the Son, can quite naturally, on the principle of communicatio idiomatum, be attributed Λόγος έστίν, έλεγεν, Οὐκ οίδα, οίδε γάρ, άλλά τὸ ἀνθρώπινον δεικνύς, ὅτι τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἰδιόν ἐστι τὸ ἀγνοεῖν, Athan. c. Ατίαπ. iii. 45); and consequently there is no need to recognize in Christ more than two wisdoms, a human and a Divine (see, further, KENOSIS).

(1) In virtue of His Divine wisdom, Christ is omniscient, i.e. He knows all actual and possible things, present, past and future, including the future contingent actions of beings possessed of free-will. The nature of this last kind of knowledge (sometimes called scientia media) is altogether inin many passages of both Testaments (1 S 23<sup>1-13</sup>, Is 41<sup>22-23</sup>, Jer 38<sup>15n</sup>, He 4<sup>13</sup> etc.), and is frequently claimed by Jesus (Mt 11<sup>20-23</sup> 26<sup>21</sup>, Jn 6<sup>70</sup> etc.), who is represented as able to read the heart of man

(2) With regard to Christ's human wisdom, believers in a real Incarnation (ἐνανθρώπησις), as distinguished from a mere assumption of a body (ἐνσάρκωσις, ἐνσωμάτωσις), are bound to recognize both its finite character and its gradual development. The gradual development of Christ's wisdom is twice noticed by St. Luke (240 πληρούμενον σοφία [σοφίαs], 2<sup>82</sup> προέκοπτε σοφία και ήλικία), and once by the author of Hebrews (5<sup>8</sup> καίπερ ων υίος, ξμαθεν αφ ων έπαθε την ύπακοήν, και τελειωθείς έγένετο, etc.). To understand the growth in wisdom here spoken of as merely exhibitive—Christ being supposed, as He grew in age, to manifest more and more of the hidden wisdom which He possessed entire from the first (so John of Damascus and most of the later Fathers; also Aquinas and the Scholastics)-is not only bad exegesis, but is virtual Apollinarism. Apollinaris denied to Christ a real human soul; but Aquinas virtually does the same when he asserts that the soul of Christ was created mature, in the full enjoyment of free-will and of the Beatific Vision, and possessed of wisdom and knowledge practically coextensive with the Divine.

Far different is the representation of the Gospels. In them Christ undergoes not simply a bodily, but a normal psychical development. He is true infant, true boy, true youth, in mind as well as in body. As Irenæus beautifully says: 'He came to save all by means of Himself-all, I say, who through Him are born again to God—infants, and children, and boys, and youths, and old men. He therefore passed through every age, becoming an infant for infants, thus sanctifying infants; a child for children, thus sanctifying those who are of this age, being at the same time made to them an example of piety, righteousness, and submission; a youth for youths, becoming an example to youths, and thus sanctifying them for the Lord' (Against Heresies, ii. 22-24). The Incarnation of Christ thus restored the norm of human development. In the growth of the child Jesus, God saw for the first time human nature expanding and perfecting itself according to its original ideal and plan, unhindered and undistorted by sin; and upon the gracious spectacle God and man looked with approval (Lk  $2^{40.52}$ ).

approval (LK  $2^{n_1}$ ).

(3) By the human wisdom  $(\sigma \circ \phi la)$  of Christ is meant His quick understanding in the things of God (cf. Ja 1<sup>5</sup>); His knowledge of the Scriptures, and His power of interpreting them (cf. Ac  $6^{n_1}$ ); His deep moral insight, gained by actual experience of temptation and suffering (He  $5^{n_1}$ ); His capacity for learning His lessons at the synagogue school (cf. Ac  $7^{n_2}$ ). His skill as a carpentar (cf. school (cf. Ac 7<sup>22</sup>); His skill as a carpenter (cf. Ex 31<sup>24</sup>); the power of asking and answering hard questions (cf. Rev 13<sup>18</sup> 17<sup>9</sup>) which He displayed even as a boy (Lk 46), and which stood Him in good stead as a boy (Lk 4°), and which stood Him in good stead on so many occasions during His ministry (Mt 22<sup>15, 23, 24</sup> etc.); His skill in constructing parables, allegories, and sententious sayings, like those of the wise men of old (cf. Mt 12<sup>4</sup>); His persuasiveness as a teacher and eloquence as a preacher (see Mt 13<sup>24</sup>, cf. 1 Co 1<sup>17</sup> 2<sup>1.4</sup>); His common sense and practical ability (cf. Col 4<sup>5</sup>); probably also His power of working miracles (Mk 6<sup>2</sup>, cf. Ac 7<sup>10</sup>), and His prophetic gift (2 P 3<sup>15</sup>), which were in Him, sartly at any rate. human endowments, as in other partly at any rate, human endowments, as in other prophets (see Mk 1322).

(4) It is implied in Scripture that Christ's human knowledge received a great extension at His Resurrection and Ascension. At the Resurrection He received all authority ( $\pi \hat{a} \sigma a \notin \delta v \sigma (a)$ ) in heaven and on earth (Mt 2818), and this authority He exercises as man, and not simply as God (Ph 216, Rev 58-14 etc.). His human knowledge, therefore, must now be coextensive with His human authority; that is, it must embrace all cosmical facts-past, present, and future. It is an error, however, to suppose that His human knowledge is even now infinite. Human nature is essentially finite, and therefore the human soul of Christ, though glorified, can never completely know the Infinite Essence of God. See,

WITNESS.—The idea of witness as related to Christ and His gospel plays an essential and highly important part in the NT writings and in the Christian faith and life universally. Not only in the primitive preaching, but also in all effectual preaching throughout the history of the Church, the gospel is conceived not as a speculative system, but as a witness to Jesus the Christ as being Himself God's Witness to the world.

Among the NT writers none appears to have so definitely and fondly reflected upon the idea of witness as St. John. It is one of his 'leading ideas.' In his Gospel (cf. Westcott, Speaker's Com. on 'St. John,' Introd.) he mentions a seven-fold witness to Christ: the witness (1) of the Father (5<sup>34</sup>.37), (2) of the Son (8<sup>14</sup> 18<sup>37</sup>), (3) of His works (10<sup>25</sup> 5<sup>36</sup>), (4) of the Scriptures (5<sup>35-46</sup>), (5) of the forerunner (1<sup>7</sup> 5<sup>35</sup>), (6) of the disciples (15<sup>27</sup> 19<sup>35</sup>), (7) of the Spirit (15<sup>26</sup> 16<sup>14</sup>). In view, however, of the unique significance of the Person of Christ, and in harmony with the method of the NT preaching, it will be most appropriate to consider our subject under these two heads:—I. The witness of Jesus Christ the Son, supported by the Among the NT writers none appears to have so ness of Jesus Christ the Son, supported by the witness of the Father and of the Spirit. II. The witness of the disciples to Jesus Christ the Son

1. THE WITNESS OF JESUS, SUPPORTED BY THE WITNESS OF THE FATHER AND OF THE SPIRIT.—1. Jesus' personal witness.— His first disciples Jesus gathered about Himself through the power of the truth which He spoke and of His own Personality, so marvellously at one with His word. He did not begin with declarations about Himself. He came to make the Father known. He came fulfilling, in word and deed, the Law and the Prophets. He preached repentance and inward righteousness. With a wealth of light He set forth the nature of the Kingdom of God. But in all this Jesus spoke as witness. He was conscious of an immediate, intimate, and unique fellowship with the Father, and out of this consciousness He spoke (Mt 1127, Jn 311 1015 1410 1721.25; see also art. CONSCIOUSNESS). The tone and manner of spiritual authority permeated all that He said and did from His earliest teaching to His words upon the cross (cf. esp. Mt 5-7, Jn 1837 1930, Lk 1143-46). But this consciousness of speaking as witness finds also distinct and emphatic expression in His word (cf. esp. Jn 8125.)

with the same of t

2. The witness of the Father to Jesus includes both the personal, inward testimony to Jesus Himself, which resulted in His full consciousness as Messiah and Son (see art. Consciousness), and all the works of God preparatory to and accompanying the life of Jesus Christ on earth designed to lead men to the certainty of faith in Him as Redeemer and Lord. Under this head we note: (1) The witness of the Scriptures (cf. esp. Jn 52, Lk 242, Ac 1043). This must be taken in the most real sense and yet not narrowly. The OT is full of the Messianic hope, and that hope was inspired by God. Jesus was steeped in the Scriptures, and He understood the things in them concerning Himself. We have no longer reason to insist upon a scheme of minute prediction and fulfilment, and yet we still affirm that Jesus is not to be understood otherwise than as the Fulfiller of the Law and the Prophets. (For a fuller discussion of this point see art. FULTILMENT. Cf. also Valeton, Christus und das AT; and Kähler, Jesus und das AT.

FILMENT. Cf. also valeton, Caristus una aus A1; and Kähler, Jesus und das AT.

(2) The witness of John as a prophet of God (cf. esp. Jn 17.8.18.198.59) is manifestly closely related to that of the Scriptures; but John is, of course, more specific than the earlier prophets could be. John's witness Jesus accepts as having a very real significance, for He regards it not as the witness of man merely, but as inspired of God.

of man merely, but as inspired of God.

(3) The witness of the works (cf. esp. Jn 530.36 1037.38 1410.11, Ac 222-24). The works are a testimony from the Father; for Jesus declares: 'The Father abiding in me doeth his works.' It would, doubtless, be a grave mistake to regard Christ's word, 'The works which the Father hath given me to accomplish, the very works that I do, bear witness of me, that the Father hath sent me,'as meaning only His miracles. The testimony of the works issues from His whole life and ministry. His whole life work was a manifestation of God, and as such was, in the larger sense, truly a miracle. See, further, artt. Miracles, Resurrection of Christ, and Sign.

3. The witness of the Spirit to Jesus the Son.-The witness of God concerning His Son calls for faith in the Son (1 Jn 5<sup>on</sup>.). This witness is borne to us primarily in objective facts (1 Jn 11st. 58.10), but it is borne in upon our consciousness only by the Spirit of God. 'It is the Spirit that beareth the Spirit of God. 'It is the Spirit that beareth witness, because the Spirit is the truth' (1 Jn 5<sup>7</sup>; cf. also Mt 16<sup>17</sup>). It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the Person and work of Jesus Christ are the object of this testimony. The Paraclete, the Spirit of truth (Christ says), 'shall bear witness of me' (Jn 15<sup>26</sup>). The witness of the Spirit, according to the NT, is a much larger thing than the assurance of personal sonship through Christ (Ro 816; cf. art. ASSURANCE). Personal assurance is an essential and unspeakably important part—in a sense the climax—of the Spirit's witness. But it is an Biblical to creat of the spirit's witness. But it is un-Biblical to speak of this unqualifiedly as the witness of the Spirit. The Spirit's testimony is coextensive with the objective testimony. The manifestation of the truth of God in objective facts becomes to us an inward illumination only through the inward witness of the Spirit. Without the testimonium Spiritus sancti infernum the objective witness is unable to produce full assurance. On the other hand, an inward persuasion that is not firmly grounded in objective reality is miserably insecure. The climax of the inward testimony is personal assurance; but the inward witness is inseparable from the outward. They are not two separate and independent testimonies. God would make us certain of His wonderful love and grace. To this end He reveals Christ for us, and He also reveals Him in us. The outward manifestation is the indispensable means to the inward revelation. The fact of the fellowship with God through the Spirit (e.g. Ro 8145.) is not a thing by itself, it is the demonstration of the truth of the promise by an initial and progressive realization of the same. The actual fellowship of the Spirit is the Spirit's own witness. See, further, art. Holy SPIRIT.

II. THE WITNESS OF THE DISCIPLES, SUP-PORTED BY THE WITNESS OF THE HOLY SPIRIT.
—Nothing could be clearer than that the primitive Christian preaching was not only the most direct and specific witness to Jesus the crucified and risen Lord, but also a witness irrepressibly spontaneous and full of the unconquerable assurance of an overpowering certainty (Ac 4<sup>20</sup>, 1 Co 9<sup>16</sup>, 2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>).

What constitutes, according to the NT, the equipment and competence of a witness of Jesus Christ? Were His original disciples the only genuine witnesses? Are not those also 'who have not seen and yet have believed' (Jn 2029) competent witnesses? In the first place, then, let us inquire how the original witnesses were prepared for their office. Early in His public ministry Jesus chose from out the larger number of His disciples 'twelve that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach' (Mk 314). These He trained to be heralds of His gospel (see art. APOSTLES; and Bruce, The Training of the Twelre), and declared that, when the Paraclete should have come to them, they should bear witness of Him (Jn 1526-27). After His Passion and Resurrection He expressly commissioned them to go forth as His witnesses (Lk 2446, Ac 18). They could, of course, have had no vital conception of Jesus and His mission without the illumination of the Holy Spirit. But was there something in their experience which constituted them the only real witnesses? Some have so held; but this is a view unwarranted by Scripture and out of harmony with the principles of evangelical Christianity. original disciples, it is true, were the only eye-and ear-witnesses. Yet what they literally saw and heard was not the revelation itself, but only the means thereto. In Jesus the flesh was, so to speak, 'a transparency for the Word.' Nevertheless multitudes 'saw and heard' Jesus and understood not. None of the rulers of this world recognized in Him the Lord of glory (1 Co 2°). The original heralds of Christ did indeed lay a certain stress upon their being eye- and ear-witnesses. But they prized their experience of sensible inter-course with the Lord not for its own sake, but because it was to them the means of entering into an inward personal fellowship with Him. In the days of His flesh this personal fellowship with Him was necessarily mediated through the senses, though the fellowship itself was not sensuous but spiritual. Even for these original disciples the time must come when their fellowship with their Lord should be wholly independent of the senses. Through the Paraclete the Lord would renew and continue His fellowship with His disciples (cf. esp. Jn 14 and 16 and 1726). But He would be no longer manifest through the senses (Jn 2017; cf. the fine sermon of H. Hoffmann, Eins ist not, p. 153). is clear from the NT that after Pentecost the original disciples were immovable in their persuasion that they possessed and had fellowship with their exalted Lord.

From all this it is clear that the visible manifestation of the Lord was designed to be superseded by a manifestation through the word of His witnesses. But can the word really take the place of the sensuous contact with the Lord's Person? For answer let it be remembered in the first place that Christ foretold that it should be sufficient (e.g. Jn 17<sup>206</sup>, Mt 28<sup>20</sup>). What the original witnesses enjoyed, others should enjoy too—the same immediate fellowship, the same certainty. As the men of Sychar believed at last not for the woman's speaking, but because they had heard for them-selves (Jn 4<sup>12</sup>), so through the word of the Apostles others are brought into actual saving relation with the same Lord Christ. Alike for those who saw Him, and for those who saw Him not, the outward facts must be inwardly apprehended and inwardly tested. And as was the design, so also is the actual experience under the gospel: where the word is truly preached the Spirit does energize and seal it, and those who believe receive the same certainty as the original disciples possessed. The whole NT preaching manifestly rests upon the full persuasion that this is and must be so (e.g. 1 P 18, He 138, 2 P 11, esp. Ac 1115.18). Faith does come by hearing (Ro 1017)—the fact of the vital union with Christ is proof of the adequacy of the word of testimony. Such is the argument of that worderful testimony. Such is the argument of that wonderful passage, 1 Jn 1<sup>1-4</sup>. Those who through their association with Christ in the flesh had apprehended the life manifested, bear witness to others, that these also may enter into the same fellowship with them—the glorious fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ. In the days of His flesh, Jesus was (according to an expression of Beyschlag in his Leben Jesu) 'His own prophet.' After His resurrection this office is committed to faithful witnesses. And it is thus that they conceive their office. The ministry of reconciliation is committed to them. As ambassadors of Christ they stand in Christ's stead (2 Co 5<sup>19, 20</sup>). To bear witness to Christ is their one aim as heralds (1 Jn 44). And their word is effectual. He who believes through their word is not then 'a Christian of a secondary order'; his knowledge of Christ is indeed mediated and yet immediate (cf. the vigorous discussion of E. Haupt, Die Bedeutung der heiligen Schrift für den evangelischen Christen).

The same holds good throughout all time. word stands firm; it never passes away (He 2<sup>1.2</sup>, Mk 13<sup>31</sup>). Wherever the word of Christ is preached with the certainty of faith, it can bring the hearer into 'the like precious faith' (2 P 11).

But the effectiveness of the word of testimony is absolutely conditioned upon the operation of the Holy Spirit. The essence of the word is the promise of fellowship, grace, eternal life through Jesus Christ. Unless the preacher has the inward consciousness of the reality of the life with Christ through the Spirit, his word is no witness. And unless the hearer is aided by the Spirit to apprehend and to prove the testimony, the word concerning peace, fellowship, freedom, and the power of an endless life would be but empty sound. When, however, the word is spoken in the Spirit, it is quick, powerful, convincing, saving (He 412, Jn 166, Ja 121). Have, then, the original witnesses no peculiar privilege and authority? So far as personal certainty is concerned, they have no advantage over true believers of any age. Nevertheless, in the economy of the gospel dispensation, the word of the original witnesses is manifestly of cardinal importance. The mere fact that they were the first witnesse is of itself sufficient to give to their testimony a peculiar importance and to make it for evangelical Christians the last resort. Even those believing critics who go farthest in the sift-ing of Apostolic tradition, agree that the saving knowledge of God in Christ is mediated to us through the primitive Christian preaching. Either we must gain our knowledge of Christ by this means, or else we must give up the inquiry, for no other way is open to us (cf. art. BACK TO CHRIST). The primitive witnesses, however, were more than merely the first, as though there by chance. had been chosen beforehand and specially trained for the work of bearing witness. Either our Lord succeeded in giving to His chosen Apostles such an understanding of His mission and work as to enable them to bear competent witness, or else He failed. If He failed, there could be no certainty for them and no gospel to us through them. The soundness and sufficiency of their witness are established by the demonstration of the Spirit and of power, and this accompanies the same witness in every succeeding age.

For the sake of their testimony many of Christ's servants have been called upon to suffer death. Such were called in a special ethical sense μάρτυρες Ἰησοῦ (Ac 22%, Rev 213 176). 'This is not to be understood, as in ecclesiastical Greek, in the sense that death was the form of their testimony, but in reference to their testimony of Jesus as having occasioned their death' (Cremer, Lex.; cf. also Rev 204). An approach to the analogous use of μαρ-τυρέω is probably to be found in 1 Ti 6<sup>13</sup> 'Jesus Christ, who before Pontius Pilate witnessed the

He was 'the prophet that cometh into the world' (Jn 614), the decisive exponent of God's will (Dt 1815. Ac 322. As in the mouth of the OT prophets, so in His, 'the word of Yahwè must of necessity be a word of woe to a sinful people' (Encyc. Bibl. iii. 3875). Like them, He was 'full of power by the spirit of the Lord, and of judgment, and of might, to declare unto Jacob his transgression, and to Israel his sin' (Mic 36). Two characters He specially abhorred—those of the seducer and the ally abhorred — those of the seducer and the hypocrite. His language respecting the Jewish leaders is 'part of the judicial language of the first Advent' (Mozley, University Serm. 29). Other Woes He utters with a sob of pity; but His indictment of the scribes and Pharisees is spoken with the wrath of love (cf. Rev 6<sup>16</sup>). His 'prophetic plainness' is a trait that must not be left out of view in studying 'the mind of Christ' and in contemp in studying 'the mind of Christ,' and in contemplating His work as Priest and King. 'As well as meekness there was anger, and besides tenderness there was strength' (Hall Caine, Illus. Lond. News, 7th Mar. 1891; cf. Tennyson, Memoir by his Son, i. 326; Ecce Homo', 272, 276).—St. Mark reports only two instances of our Lord's using the word with 1th does not cover in St. Lehn. But word oval. St. John reports many stern utterances respecting those who sinned against light.

The Woe of Mk 13<sup>17</sup> (|| Mt 24<sup>19</sup>, Lk 21<sup>22</sup>) was spoken by Christ with deep commiseration; at the same time the passage in which it occurs is a prophetic one relating to the doom of Jerusalem which had rejected Him (cf. Lk 23<sup>28, 29</sup>). Eusebius (HE iii. 5) and Epiphanius (de Mens. 15) mention the flight of the Christians. Mt 11<sup>21</sup> (|| Lk 10<sup>13</sup>)—where the mention of Chorzin shows how much of our Lord's work of Chorazin shows how much of our Lord's work is left unrecorded (Plummer)—is part of a farewell lamentation over the three cities by the Lake which had seen His manifestations of Divine power which had seen His manifestations of Divine power but had not repented, and agrees with other forewarnings that judgment will be most woeful for those who have thrown away the highest opportunities (Mt 12<sup>41.42</sup> || Lk 11<sup>31.32</sup>; cf. Lk 12<sup>47.45</sup>|... In Mt 18<sup>7</sup> (|| Lk 17<sup>1</sup>, cf. Mk 9<sup>42</sup>), the first Woe is spoken in pity, but the second in wrath. As is shown by the  $d\nu d\gamma \kappa \eta \gamma d\rho$  and the corresponding words in Lk., as well as by the context,  $obstar k d\gamma k \eta \gamma d\rho$  is a lamentation over the ills brought of πόσμο is a lamentation over the ills brought on mankind by ambitious and selfish passions. The egotist and ambitionist (to use a word of Carlyle's) becomes the oppressor of the weak, and he also becomes their seducer,—a character for which Christ had such a loathing that He said 'it were better for him [who bears it] that a millstone were better for nim [who bears it] that a ministone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.' The second Woe, introduced by  $\pi\lambda\eta\nu$  (on which word see Plummer, St. Luke, 182), is directed against a man of this sort  $(\tau\hat{\psi} \ a\nu\theta\rho\hat{\omega}\pi\psi \ \epsilon\kappa\epsilon\nu\psi$ , the latter word putting him outside the pale of sympathy and respect), who, in our Lord's view, has committed the most heinous crime against the law of love (cf. Bruce, Expos. Gr. Test. 237; Wendt, Teaching of Jesus, i. 344; Carr, Expositor, 1898 (ii.), 348; Hastings' DB iii. 586ª).

Of the two passages in which our Lord pronounces wee against the contemporary leaders of Judaism, the one in Lk 11 is an early utterance, and was spoken in the house of a Pharisee who had asked Him to dine with him (v.37), while the other in Mt 23 is a late and public denunciation of them in Jerusalem on the eve of His death. It was spoken when they were present, and for the purpose of warning the multitudes and His disto Mt 23 in Mk. and Lk. is to be found in the brief sayings reported in Mk 12<sup>38-40</sup> and Lk 20<sup>48-47</sup>.

In Lk 11<sup>42, 43, 44, 46, 47, 52</sup> there are two indictments containing three Woes apiece, and addressed to Pharisees and lawyers (wh. see) respectively. Sentence is first pronounced upon the Pharisees for being so punctilious about matters of a subordinate nature, which should be kept in their proper place, while they neglected those moral obligations, which were of far higher moment, 'judgment and the love of God' (v. a); for putting themselves forward into the first seats in the face of the congregation, and their fondness for having reverence done to them in public (v.4); and for being a secret source of defilement to others who were not aware of the evil tendency of their principles (v.4, cf. 12). The second of these charges occurs, but without a Woe in Mt 236.7; while the other two are repeated in a more severe form in Mt 23<sup>22, 27</sup>.

The lawyers are then condemned for amplifying the written Law with their intolerably burdensome enactments, which they contrive to evade them-selves, while so rigorous in exacting obedience to them from others (Lk 11<sup>46</sup>); for their zeal in the erection and adornment of the tombs of the prophets, which, in bitter irony, is pronounced to be a sign of their continuing the work of the murderers of the prophets (vv. 47. 46; Wendt, i. 281; Ecce Homo 1, 267); and for taking away 'the key of knowledge' (see KEYS) by their traditional interpretations, which rendered the people incapable of recognizing the living truth (v. 23). The first of these charges is found in Mt 234 without a Woe; the others are repeated in Mt 2312. 2247.

This later denunciation (Mt 2313. (14)* 15. 16. 23. 25. 27. 29; cf. Is 58. 11. 18. 20-22, Hab 26. 9. 12. 18. 19) is still more impressive on account of its epic strain ('octies vae; Mt 5<sup>3-11</sup> octies beati, Bengel). It shows how intense is the heat of our Lord's wrath when it is kindled (Ps 212), as no other continuous passage in the Gospels does. In it, our Lord pronounces woe against the scribes and Pharisees for their 'hypocrisy' or their dishonesty and love of stage-effect in religion, which was to Him the most hateful impiety; also for shutting the doors of the Kingdom of God which He had opened by His preaching, and so preventing people from entering (v. 12, cf. Rev 36); for plundering (prob. wealthy and devout) widows (Plummer cites examples from the Talmud), and deceiving simple-minded people (Theophylact) by the long prayers they make (v. 14); for carrying on a most laborious propaganda for the purpose of gaining proselytes (cf. Jos. Ant. xx. ii. 4), and then making the most full of existing them then then proselytes (cf. Jos. Ant. XX. 11. 4), and then making them more full of spiritual pride than themselves (v. 18, cf. the Judaistic proselytizers who so relentlessly dogged St. Paul's footsteps, Hastings' DB iv. 136b); for pretending to guide others in the doing of God's will when they showed that they were so wanting in moral perception themselves (cf. Mt 15<sup>14</sup> || Lk 6<sup>20</sup>); as, for example, when they subscript that they are justiced by the sephistical they subverted truth and justice by the sophistical distinctions they made in regard to the binding nature of different kinds of oaths (vv. 16-22, cf. Mk 76-13). He then condemned them for omitting 'the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and fidelity, while they were so exact in tithing their smaller garden herbs, thus 'straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel' (vv. 23. 24); and for so carefully observing, 'in preparing their food, the ceremonial rules for preserving their Levitical purity,' while they were not careful 'to avoid the moral defilement caused by the unlawful acquisition of that food, and by using it to minister to intemperance' (vv. 25. 25, Wendt, i. 327). He compared the fair show of goodness they made with the artificial whiteness imparted to sepulchres by washing them with lime in spring (vv. 27. 26, cf. Holtzmann, Meyer, in loc.; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 5138). The final Woe was pronounced with a stinging reference to the honours they were paying to the prophets whom their fathers killed (vv. 99-31); and, the cup of His indignation brimming over at the thought of His own impending death at their hands, He said, 'Fill ye up then the measure of (the sins of) your fathers' (v. 22).

'Tremendous' (Mozley) as this language is, we are not to think that it was meant to apply to all the Pharisees indiscriminately. Nicodemus was a Pharisee (Jn 3'), and there were, doubtless, many others (cf. Ac 5<sup>24</sup>) with respect to whom the charge of hypocrisy was inadmissible. Paul, as a Pharisee, was no hypocrite (Ph 3<sup>8, 6</sup>); his Pharisaic upbringing was an important part of his providential ing was an important part of his providential training for his Christian Apostleship, and 'from Pharisaism in so far as it meant zeal for the highest objects of Jewish faith he never departed, and never could depart' (Ac 26<sup>3, 22</sup>; Hort, Judaistic Christianity, 108 ff.). In this very chapter, our Lord admits their authority as that of those who 'sit in Moses' seat,' and even gives His sanction to some of their mirror phenomenous. tion to some of their minor observances (Mt 23<sup>2</sup> m; cf. Hort, 31-32). A well-known passage in the Talmud, distinguishing the various classes of Pharisees from each other, says that the real and only Pharisee is 'he who does the will of his Father in heaven because he loves Him' (Levy, NHWB

4. 143).

In his famous article on the Talmud (Qu. Review, Oct. 1867), the late Emanuel Deutsch pronounced a warm panegyric on 'the chiefly Pharisaic masters of the Mishnic period' for their wisdom, piety, kindness, and high and noble courage' (Literary Remains, 29). C. G. Monteflore (Hibbert Journal, Jan. 1903) has called attention to the 'new and large material, so interesting, so counter to current conceptions and verdicts, produced by Schechter, 'the foremost Rabbinic scholar of his age,' in his articles in the JQR (1894–1900). But 'Schechter confesses that the view he has to give of Rabbinical religion presents a blank at the important period'—the time of Christ. 'We are driven back, therefore, on the Gospela.' . . The evidence they afford appears irresistible . . . and an appeal to the principles of the religion as set forth in the OT and in the Mishnah cannot prevail to discredit the facts there recorded '(Menzics, Hibbert Journal, July, 1903). There is thus no reasonable ground for doubt that during our Lord's life on earth the scribes and Pharisses were immersed in that externalism and religious affectation which He so vividity depicted; and it was their implacable hostility to His spiritual teaching, begun at a very early period in His ministry (Mk 38), that in the end brought about His crucifixion.

This, which is perhaps the saddest sentence in the Gospels, was spoken with the control of out vindictiveness, although it undoubtedly reveals that our Lord was wounded to the quick by the treachery of Judas. The excluse seems to set him finally outside the circle of the disciples (cf. Westcott on Jn 1327). But this Woe is not an impreca-It is not the devoting of Judas tion like Ps 109. to destruction. Similarly the words which follow, καλου αυτώ εί ουκ έγεννήθη ο ανθρωπος έκείνος, are 'not to be pressed with logical rigour' (Meyer), but are to be understood as meaning, Better not to have lived at all than to have lived to betray the Son of Man.' The whole saying witnesses to the anguish that our Lord felt on account of the perfidy of this false friend (cf. Ps 41°, Jn 131°); and we can sympathize with Keim when he says (Jesus of Nazara, v. 286) that we should have to greet it as the removal of a hundred-pound weight from the heart of Christendom if the treachery of Judas could be proved to have had no existence. But this is as impossible as to remove the burden, 'Tiberio imperitante, supplicio adfectus erat,' from the heart of mankind.

There still remain the four Woes which in Lk 624-26 are set over against the four Beatitudes in vv. 20-28. vv.<sup>20-28</sup>. Their authenticity, as well as that of the Beatitudes in their Lukan form, is called in ques-DB, Ext. Vol. 16; Encyc. Bibl. iv. 4383), but on grounds that are very far from convincing. The objection taken to the Woes from their being omitted in Mt. is not of much weight. The data for determining the precise relation between the sermons in Mt. and Lk. are wanting. Each of the writers may have had before him a different report of the same Sermon; or there may have been two similar but different Sermons, reported in two distinct documents, of which the one was used by Mt. and the other by Luke. In either case, the omission of the Woes in Mt. would be sufficiently accounted for (cf. Sanday, Expositor, 1891 (i.), 311ff.; Loisy, Le Discours sur la Montagne, quoted in Expositor, 1904 (ii.), 103). The external form in which the Woes (and also the Beatitudes) are set forth illustrates our Lord's method of teaching 'by aiming at the greatest clearness in the briefest compass' (Wendt, Teaching, i. 130, 134; cf. ii. 68); the characteristics stated were comprehensive and significant enough to enable His hearers to understand who were the persons intended. When He began by saying, 'Blessed are ye poor: for yours is the kingdom of God,' He gave His hearers the key to the meaning of the other utterances which followed. For 'the poor' (the 'aniyyim) was a term that had long had an ethical and spiritual connotation (cf. Driver, art. 'Poor' in Hastings' DB iv. 19, 20; Harnack, What is Christianity? 92); and this would prevent our Lord's utterances from being interpreted in a materialistic sense. See artt. EBIONISM, POOR, POVERTY, WEALTH.

In our opinion it is more probable that the Woes are authentic than that they are inferences from our Lord's teaching (Bruce, Kingdom of God, 10), or that they 'arose in consequence of the affliction of the persecuted Christians' (Meyer, Com. on Lk., p. 55), or that they 'were constructed for the purpose of strengthening and interpreting the Beatitudes, after the model of Dt 27<sup>156</sup>. Is 5<sup>26</sup>. 'Holtmann Hand Commentar 104) (Holtzmann, Hand-Commentar, 104). In view of the social conditions that exist at the present day, can it be said that their admonition is unneeded, or that they are not still living utterances? See also artt. WOMAN.—The relation of Christ to woman is one of the most interesting and one of the most difficult topics in the Gospels. In order to estimate it aright it will be necessary to say something of was born. In the East generally, the penal code of Babylon well describes her abject humiliation: 'If a husband say unto his wife, Thou art not my wife, he shall pay half a mina and be free. But wife, he shall pay half a mina and be free. But if a woman repudiate her husband, she shall be drowned in the river.' And her position was not much better in Judæa, where any, even the most frivolous, pretext could be given for divorce. 'The Jewish Law unquestionably allowed divorce on almost any ground' (Edersheim, Life and Times, ii. 333). The school of Hillel declared it a sufficient ground for divorce if a woman had excited her has ground for divorce if a woman had spoiled her husband's dinner. In Greece the dignity of married life was very inadequately appreciated; even Socrates invites the courtesan Aspasia to talk with him 'as to how she might ply her occupation with most profit.' In Rome there were signs of better There was always a halo over the old things. Roman matron, and though time dissipated this, and divorce was so common that Seneca tells us that ladies reckoned their ages not by the consuls, but by the number of their husbands,* yet women were gradually acquiring more and more influence and being more widely educated. In parts of the Roman Empire, especially in Macedonia, 'her social position was higher than in most parts of the civilized world. At Philippi, at Thessalonica and Berœa, the women—in some cases certainly, in all probably, ladies of birth and rank—take an active part with the Apostle (Paul). . . The extant Macedonian inscriptions seem to assign to the sex a higher social influence than is common among the civilized nations of antiquity.'† But however this position might vary in different parts of the Empire, it was clearly exceptional for the relation of woman to man to be other than a degrading one. The many exceptions only draw attention to the prevailing feeling.

This relation was necessarily profoundly modified by our Lord's birth of the Virgin Mother. This fact, though it could have been known to only a very few during His lifetime, had nevertheless its own particular bearing. It brought Mary into a prominence which otherwise would have been un-accountable. It is true that Joseph may have died when our Lord was a child or before He began His ministry, but even this does not fully account for the position the mother occupies in the Gospels. It is not much we learn, for we know it was her habit to ponder over and keep to herself the secrets connected with His early life (Lk 219. 51), but that one scene at the village wedding (Jn 2) is sufficient to give us a clear conception of her importance. She alone knew how great He was, and how wonderful the destiny that was promised Him. And yet she was not so overwhelmed by its greatness as to lose her own personality. The ordinary Oriental lose her own personality. The ordinary Oriental mother would not have presumed to guide or direct the life of one so mysteriously born and whose future was so infinitely great. But she has so long been accustomed to suggest, if not to direct, that it is natural for her, when she sees an opportunity for the display of His power and the satisfaction of a need, to point it out. The reply, seemingly so harsh to us, only marks out her position the more clearly. The words, 'Woman, what have I to do with thee? mine hour is not yet come,' could not have been said to one who had occupied but a subservient position in the home; on the contrary, they suggest that for many years she had been accus-tomed to speak freely as to her wishes for Him, and that this time was now over. From this it may be inferred that our Lord rejoiced in the true development of womanhood, was glad that the mother should not be a mere drudge or slave, but one occupying a definite position with definite duties and responsibilities. Further, it is clear from her question that He had not checked her interest in the wider events of the world and the Kingdom of God. A veil will always rest over the frequent communings between the Mother and the Son, but it is quite clear from the use of the expression 'mine hour,' that she had been led to think of and desire that time of manifestation when His Personality should be revealed. From the beginning, even before His birth, her mind had often been occupied with that revelation from the spiritual world in which the angel had spoken of a 'throne' and a 'kingdom' (Lk 122.28). Her mind, then, was not to be confined to the limited sphere of the household duties of the peasant's home. At the same time, it is clear that the natural desire, even in one so humble and lowly as she was, to have some share in the events which would lead to the bringing in of the Kingdom, was not to be gratified. Her part lay in the careful training, educating, and helping of that great Life which was entrusted to her.

It is singular, and some have thought that it was designed with a view to checking the Mariolatry which in the years to come was to dominate a large section of the Church, that Jesus refuses to allow the unique distinction which Mary certainly had in being the mother of the world's Redeemer to weigh against the worth of religious character. It was natural that one who recognized the beauty of His character and the power of His words should say, 'Blessed be the womb that bare thee, and the breasts that thou didst suck' (Lk 1127); but the answer, whilst admitting the blessing, pointed to a higher one within the reach of all. 'Yea rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God and keep it' (v. 28). This teaching is akin to that He gave when some one directed His attention to the fact that His mother and brethren were waiting to see Him. 'Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?'—He cried—and then stretching forth His hand towards His disciples, He said, Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother' (Mt 12<sup>472</sup>). From this it is clear that whilst He gave her, who was blessed indeed amongst women in being His mother, full opportunities for the development of her mind and spirit, never checking during those thirty years those natural desires to know all that He would tell her of the Kingdom of which the angel had spoken to her, yet He chiefly valued in her the growth of those spiritual races which had led to her being selected for the high position she held. And nothing is more remarkable than the response she gave. During those three years she almost disappears from sight; and when at the very last she is seen beside the cross, her attitude expresses that dignity, reserve, and self-control which she had learned of Him. When the great tragedy is being enacted, and the greatest possible excitement prevails, she, like her Divine Son, maintains an attitude of quiet selfrestraint. The Oriental, even the Jewish, mother would have been prostrate, with dishevelled hair and garments; Mary is found 'standing' (Jn 1928). There is no mention of words, not even of tears. Silently and quietly at the direction of her Son she leaves the cross, though we know that a sword was at the time piercing her through and through.

We have given much time to the study of the Virgin Mother because she was the only woman really educated by Christ, in the sense that St. John and St. Peter were, and we see in the little that is told of her what a true woman ought to be. The relation of Christ to the other women of the Gospels is just what we should expect from our knowledge of His relation to His mother. is a freedom which surprises even His disciples (Jn 427), and a readiness to help which laid His character open to misconception (Lk 739). There is also the most delicate sensitiveness to the inner consciousness of shame in the sinner which at once wins confidence. His hatred of the sin never dominates over His love of the sinner. Simon was right in feeling that a prophet who knew the character of the woman who had intruded into his house would never have allowed her such close fellowship as the Saviour allowed. None but He, the sinless, could have done so. Again, none but He would have shown such patience as was seen in His treatment of the woman of Samaria (Jn 4). When He makes it plain that He knows her sin, and she changes the subject, He does not refuse to follow her, but makes the very controversy she introduces a means of spiritual help. It was this combination of strength and tenderness, of respect for the individuality of the soul and yet desire to disentangle it from its sins, that gave Him just that same pre-eminent place amongst the women as amongst the men of His day. They were glad to be of what assistance they could to His work, and ministered of their substance (Lk 83). It is characteristic that whilst they show a courage which surpasses that of the Twelve, they also show a wealth of devotion which is unintelligible to them. The presence of some near the cross, where they would be exposed to insults and rudeness, is as remarkable as St. Mary's gift of the alabaster cruse of ointment in the last week of His life. They respond more readily and easily to the power of His words and Personality. From Martha our Lord obtains a confession, even fuller and more far reaching than that of St. Peter (Jn 11<sup>34-27</sup>). And from the heathen Canaanitish woman He received one of the most remarkable illustrations of faith, the woman's insight penetrating beyond the words to the love which lay underneath them (Mt 1522ff., Mk 725ff.).

The great respect in which Jesus held the position of woman, the high dignity He attached to it, is shown not only by His actions and words, but by the new sanctity which He gave to marriage. The words, 'The twain shall become one flesh' (Mt 19<sup>5</sup>=Mk 10<sup>8</sup>), placed the wife at once on a level with the husband, and made the divorces that were so common impossible. Directly this teaching was received, it was impossible that woman should be deprived of her right as wife on the flimsiest excuse, or without any excuse at all. The revolution such a declaration made is realized only when we hear the comment of the spiritually minded disciples, 'If the case of the man is so with his wife, it is not expedient to marry' (Mt 1910). That woman had a position in life of equal importance with that of man is made plain by the whole story of the Gospels: Anna, Elisabeth, the Virgin Mary, Martha, Mary, and Mary Magdalene rivalling in their own spheres St. Peter, St. John, St. James, St. Andrew. Without the part played by woman, that story would have been altogether incomplete.

One other suggestion as to the influence of woman which St. Matthew gives us is as interesting as it is unexpected. The dream of Pilate's wife is an evidence of the power that Christ's life and teaching exercised beyond the narrow circle of Jewish thought. Pilate, governor though he is, neither hears nor sees anything, and even when face to face with Christ is only puzzled not convinced. His wife, on the other hand, is deeply interested in all that she hears. Her mind is full of the doings of the Prophet of Nazareth. Her sleep is disturbed. She wakes frightened, and so convinced of the greatness of the issue her husband is trying, that she dares to interfere, though without success (Mt 27<sup>19</sup>). Not too much can be made of this; but it is an indication, which the Gospel narrative emphasizes, that women are more susceptible to religious impressions than men, and are ready to make larger sacrifices. As women ministered at the Birth, the Presentation in the Temple, and during those early years when His mother was His chief teacher, so they ministered at the Entombment, when they anointed His body; at the Resurrection, when they carried the news to the frightened disciples; and at the Ascension, when they with the Apostles and the rest of His disciples received His blessing. WOMANLINESS .- Christianity is distinguished for the honour it assigns, the liberty it allows to woman. 'Christianity raises woman from the slavish position which she held, both in Judaism and in heathendom, to her true moral dignity and importance, makes her an heir of the same salvation with man, and opens to her a field for the noblest and loveliest virtue' (Schaff's Apostolic Christianity, p. 441 f.). The duties of husbands are, according to St. Peter (1 P 3'), to be regulated by a recognition of the principle that their wives are 'also joint heirs of the grace of life.' In the Christian society 'the conventional distinctions of religious caste or of social rank, even the natural distinction of sex, are banished,' for 'there can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free there can be no male and female; for ye are all one man in Christ Jesus' (Gal 328). Lightfoot in loco quotes a saying of Jesus from the Apocryphal Gospel of the Egyptians, which may be founded on this verse—'Being asked by Salome when His kingdom should come, He is reported to have answered, "When the two shall be one, and the male with the female, neither male nor female." This mystical saying has its fulfilment in the character of Jesus. For the characteristic of Jesus Christ, and so the regulative principle of Christian morality, is completeness, symmetry, harmony, balance. Other men are known and loved for this or that excellence; but of Jesus Christ, with respect to His personal perfection, we can say what was said of Shakspeare with regard to his artistic pre-eminence, 'His speciality is everything.'
Manhood in its wholeness and fulness is found in Him, alike wide in its range and lofty in its reach. Hence Jesus Christ is not a pattern merely for one sex, or one age, or one time, or one temperament, or one class. In this sense, too, there is in Him neither male nor female, bond nor free, Jew nor Greek, learned nor unlearned.

The sphere of woman is the home, not the world. Man lives in effort and conflict. 'But woman is at home in the region of feeling and affection, and she finds her highest vocation in the cultivation of those loves and sympathies that make home the dearest spot on earth. Man, being thus active and even combative, develops 'pertinacity and self-assertion; whereas the receptive nature of woman manifests itself rather in patient endurance and tender devotion to the service of loved ones. Her emotions dominate her intellect; her judgment to a certain extent is biassed by her feelings. On the other hand, where moral as well as intellectual considerations come into view, woman's judgment is likely to be as just as that of man, whose decisions are frequently based on grounds of reason alone' (Bruce, The Formation of Christian Character, p. 57 f.). May we find any such signs of womanliness in the character or teaching of Jesus?

Jesus assigned great importance to marriage and family, the sanctity and unity of the home. Although His vocation required His abandonment of home (Jn 24, Mk 383. 34), and He required of His disciples also the same renunciation (Lk 142), yet the missed the shelter and peace of home (Mt 8<sup>20</sup>), and recognized the greatness of the sacrifice involved (Mt 19<sup>20</sup>). His denunciation of the lax traditions of the elders regarding divorce (Mt 19<sup>2-2</sup>) and the duty of children to their parents (Mk 79-13 was in defence of the home. It is supremely significant that love, the grace of the home, and not justice, the virtue of the State, is made the first and greatest commandment (Mk 12<sup>29-31</sup>). The child is nearer, means more, to the mother than to the father; and Jesus understood and cared for children (Mt 1116 182-3 1912-15). Does not the modesty of the woman appear in His reference to the lustful glance (Mt 5<sup>28</sup>), and His stooping to write upon the ground when the woman taken in her sin stood before Him (Jn 8<sup>6</sup>)? Jesus understood the heart of a woman in penitence (Lk 7<sup>47</sup>) and in gratitude (Jn 12<sup>7,8</sup>). His defence of the offering of love shows not only His active but also His receptive affection ateness, His yearning for, as well as bestowal of, the generosities of the heart. He was not only intensely emotional, but quick in expressing His emotions (Jn 11<sup>25, 28</sup>, Mk 7<sup>24</sup> 8<sup>12</sup>, Jn 11<sup>25</sup>, Lk 13<sup>24</sup> 19<sup>4</sup>, Mt 23<sup>27</sup>). His tenderness, gentleness, patience, and forbearance are more distinctively feminine than masculine graces. In His resignation and obedience to His Father's will (Mt 11<sup>26, 29</sup>) is there not a womanly rather than a manly submissiveness? The prominence He gives in the Beatitudes to the passive graces of endurance rather than the active virtues of endeavour (Mt 5<sup>2-10</sup>) vindicates the distinctive excellence of womanhood. His teaching about non-resistance (Mt 5<sup>28-42</sup>), so much misunderstood and neglected, can be better appreciated by women than by men, for such patience under wrong has entered into their life more than into that of men. The mind of Jesus was intuitive rather than ratiocinative; His moral judgment was swift and sure; His spiritual discernment direct; and these are characteristic of women rather than of men.

Doubtless it was this womanliness in Jesus that attracted and attached so many women to Him during His earthly ministry: and they received from Him a loving welcome such as they did not find in any other religious teacher of the age. his disciples were astonished that He was speaking to the woman of Samaria (Jn 4<sup>27</sup>), and doubtless the prejudices of many were offended by His action regarding women. His defence of the sinful woman and of Mary has been already noted. 'We have a lovely group of female disciples and friends around the Lord: Mary, the wife of Clopas; Salome, the mother of James and John; Mary of Bethany, who sat at Jesus' feet; her busy and hospitable sister Martha; Mary of Magdala, whom the Lord healed of a demoniacal possession; the sinner, who washed His feet with her tears of penitence and wiped them with her hair; and all the noble women who ministered to the Son of Man in His earthly poverty with the gifts of their love (Lk 8³, Mt 27³5, Mk 15³4), lingered last around His Cross (Jn 19²5), and were first at His open sepulchre on the morning of the resurrection (Mt 28¹, Jn 20¹)' [Schaff, op. cit. p. 442]). The reverence that the mother of Jesus and of Mary has been already noted. 'We have a p. 442]). The reverence that the mother of Jesus has properly inspired has given to womanhood a glory, and to woman a position and influence in the Christian Church, never before and nowhere else recognized. To the instances given above of the recognized. To the instances given above of the relation of Jesus to women we may add His compassion for the widow of Nain (Lk 7<sup>13</sup>), and His commendation of the widow's mites (Mk 12<sup>48</sup>. 44). His treatment of a woman on three occasions appears harsh, but a consideration of the circumstances in each case removes this impression. His rebuke to His mother at Cana (Jn 24) expresses His dread of any human interference with His ful-filment of His Divine vocation (cf. the rebuke of Peter, Mt 16<sup>22</sup>); His repulse of the Syrophænician mother (Mk 7<sup>27</sup>) was His own indignant protest against Jewish exclusiveness; His requirement that the woman healed by touching His garment should confess her deed was no violence done to her sense of modesty, but was intended to replace the uncertainty of a cure snatched unawares by the assurance of healing willingly bestowed (Mk 534). What Christ has been to and done for women throughout the history of Christendom, and what women have suffered and accomplished for His Church and Kingdom on earth, afford abundant and conclusive evidence of the womanliness of Jesus in presenting in His character all womanly grace as well as manly virtue, and offering in His salvation what meets the deepest needs, and fulfils the loftiest hopes of womanhood in all lands and ages. See also WOMAN.

ALFRED E. GARVIE.

WONDERS.—The two terms 'signs' and 'wonders' are frequently joined in the OT, and this usage is carried over into the NT. The word πέρας, 'wonder,' never occurs in the NT except in connexion with σημεῖον, 'sign' (wh. see). The Heb. correlatives were πρω and mm. Jesus used the conjoined terms twice in His recorded sayings—once when He foretold that false prophets would come and 'show great signs and wonders' (Mk 13<sup>22</sup>, Mt 24<sup>24</sup>), and once when He complained that the people demanded such things of Him before they would have faith in Him—'Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will in no wise believe' (Jn 4<sup>48</sup>). The word πέρας occurs nowhere else in the Gospels. Elsewhere in the NT it is found once in a quotation from Joel to represent the marvels wrought by Jehovah in the heaven (Ac 2<sup>19</sup>), and twelve times in reference to miracles wrought by Moses (7<sup>26</sup>), by Jesus (2<sup>22</sup>), by the man of sin (2 Th 2<sup>9</sup>), and by the Apostles and early missionaries (Ac 2<sup>28</sup> 4<sup>20</sup> 5<sup>12</sup> 6<sup>8</sup> 14<sup>3</sup> 15<sup>12</sup>, Ro 15<sup>19</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>12</sup>, He 2<sup>4</sup>). From the use of the word made by Jesus we might conclude that He did not esteem signs and wonders very highly, and that He freely granted that they were possible to false prophets as well as to Himself. In Origen (c. Celsum) we find practically the same attitude of thought. Origen is disposed to concede that signs and wonders are wrought among the heathen.

'Now, in order to grant that there did exist a healing spirit named Esculapius, who used to cure the bodies of men, I would say to those who are astonished at such an occurrence, that since the cure of bodies is a thing indifferent, and a matter within the reach not merely of the good, but also of the bad, you must show that they who practise healing are in no respect wicked '(iii. 25 [Migne, vol. xi. col. 948]).

On the other hand, Celsus is willing to acknowledge that signs and wonders were wrought by Jesus, but he thinks the inference from these is unwarranted. They are to him no proof of Deity. He compares them to—the feats performed by those who have been taught by Egyptians, who in the middle of the market-place, in return for a few obols, will impart the knowledge of their most venerated arts, and will expel demons from men, and dispel diseases, and invoke the souls of heroes, and exhibit expensive banquets and tables and dishes and dainties having no real existence, and who will put in motion, as if alive, what are not really living animals, but which have only the appearance of life. Then he asks: "Since, then, these persons can perform such feats, shall we of necessity conclude that they are sons of God, or must we admit that they are the proceedings of wicked men under the influence of an evil spirit?" (6.68).

It was easy for Origen to answer that Jesus never wrought His signs and wonders only for show, as magicians did, and that His constant aim was the reformation of character, as that of the magicians most evidently was not. Then he adds:

'How should not He, who by the miracles which He did induced those who beheld the excellent results to undertake the reformation of their characters, manifest Himself not only to His genuine disciples, but also to others, as a pattern of most virtuous life, in order that His disciples might devote themselves to the work of instructing men in the will of God, and that the others, after being more fully instructed by His word and character than by His miracles as to how they were to direct their lives, might in all their conduct have a constant reference to the good pleasure of the universal God?' (i. 68 [Migne, vol. xi. col. 788]).

Origen seems to have caught the very mind of the Master at this point. Jesus made use of signs and wonders to authenticate His mission, but His chief emphasis was always upon His 'word and character' rather than upon His miracles. Both Origen and Celsus, however, as these passages show, are willing to grant that signs and wonders were wrought by Jesus and by false prophets alike. Origen calls attention to the fact that Jesus, as indeed the entire NT, never calls miracles by the name τέρατα alone, but always joins this to some other term suggesting higher things (in Joan. xviii. 60 [Migne, vol. xiv. col. 521]). The τέρας was to the heathen merely a portent or prodigy, something unusual and extraordinary, something strange and abnormal, or, as Augustine put it, 'quidquid arduum aut insolitum supra spem vel facultatem mirantis apparet,' and more closely, 'quædam sunt quæ solam faciunt admirationem' (de Utilitate cre-dendi, cap. xvi. [Migne, vol. xlii. col. 90]). Jesus could not be content to allow this name to stand alone for any of His miracles. It had to do merely with the outward effect or the temporary impression caused by the marvel, and some other term was added to show that the marvel was an term was added to show that the marvel was an exhibition of Divine power and a sign of a Divine presence among men. The wonder caught the attention and impressed the memory, and was subservient to the interests of the Kingdom in attracting men to listen and investigate, to hear and be saved. Jesus used it for an immediate individual benefit, but always with an eye to a further spiritual end. WORD.—(λόγος, βήμα) is employed in the Gospels in a large variety of senses: (1) articulate utterance of any kind; (2) the inspired word of Scripture (cf. Mk 7<sup>15</sup>— making the word of God of none effect through your traditions. through your traditions'); (3) a Divine message generally (Lk 3° 'The word of God came to John in the wilderness,' so Lk 4° 811 1129); (4) the 'word of the kingdom,' i.e. the gospel message (Mt 13196., Mk 1620, Lk 51); (5) Christ's word of authority (Lk 420 'What a word is this, that even the winds and the see chey him'); (6) in the Prologue to and the sea obey him'); (6) in the Prologue to the Fourth Gospel, Christ Himself is the 'Word made flesh' (see Logos).

The peculiar significance attached to the spoken 'word' is to be explained in the light of Hebrew usage. In the OT, as in all primitive thought, a word is something more than an articulate sound with a given import. It is endowed with a certain power and reality. It carries with it some portion of the life and personality of the speaker. This is true more especially of a word spoken by God. Such a word is instinct with the Divine will, and effects by its own inherent power the thing which it indicates. 'As the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, so shall my word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please' (Is 55<sup>10t</sup>.). The 'word' delivered to the prophets is here conceived as an active power, which will bring about its own fulfilment. His creation and government of the world, God effects His purpose by His 'word' (Gn 1, Ps 33<sup>6.9</sup> 107<sup>20</sup>). It is regarded not simply as a commandment, but as a vital energy which is sent forth from God and realizes His will.

The references in the Gospels are coloured throughout by this Hebrew conception. Even where Divine utterance is not in question, a value is ascribed to 'words' which does not belong to them according to our modern modes of thought. 'For every idle word that a man speaks, he shall give account in the judgment;—for by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned' (Mt 12<sup>881</sup>.). Jesus regards the most casual word as more than wasted breath. It is a spiritual force, and the man who sets it free is responsible for the good or evil which it produces. A similar estimate of the value of words underlies the many injunctions against profane, or foolish, or thoughtless, or unkind speech (Mt 5<sup>22, 24-37</sup>, Lk 12<sup>10</sup>, Mt 12<sup>34</sup>). Such 'words' have all the significance of wicked actions. Coming 'from within a man,' they express his mind and character even more truly than deeds, and will bear witness of him in the Judgment.

The influence of the OT conception appears more clearly, however, in the allusions to Christ's own 'word.' It is the vehicle of His word. power. It has virtue in it to heal diseases and to power. It has virtue in it to heal diseases and to quiet the winds and the sea. In several passages the 'word' is explained as one of kingly authority, which had might over the spiritual agencies at work in nature (cf. Lk 428, Mt 818). But the radical idea is undoubtedly that of a 'word with power' (Lk 422) analogous to the Divine word. To give effect to His will, Jesus had only to utter it; the word that went out from Him was itself 'quick and powerful,' and acted in His stead. In this sense also we must interpret the references to the message of Jesus as 'the word.' As thus described, the gospel is something more than the Christian teaching or the proclamation of the Messianic Kingdom. The idea is suggested that a new power had entered the world through Jesus, and communicated itself in His spoken message. Thus in the parable of the Sower, the word is compared to seed which contains in itself wonderful potentialities. All that is required of men is the right disposition of heart; the message, once received disposition of heart; the message, once received into the 'good ground,' will henceforth work of itself, with a living and ever-increasing power.

In the Fourth Gospel, more especially, the allusions to the words of Jesus have everywhere a pregnant meaning. 'The words that I speak unto you are spirit and life' (Jn 6<sup>63</sup>); 'Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you' (15<sup>3</sup>); 'He that heareth my word hath everlasting life' (5<sup>24</sup>);—in such sayings and many others the idea of whole-hearted assimilation of the the idea of whole-hearted assimilation of the teaching of Jesus is certainly present, but it is by no means the only, or the central, idea. It is indeed characteristic of the Fourth Gospel that Jesus says little by way of positive teaching. He Himself, in His own Person, is the revelation, and the words ascribed to Him have reference mainly the words astriced to Him have retreence mainly to His supreme worth as the Light of the world—the Way, the Truth, and the Life. Because they thus give expression to His Divine claim, they in a manner represent Himself. To accept the words is to receive Jesus, in His life-giving power, into one's heart (cf. 157 'If ye abide in me and my words abide in you').

It has often been suggested that the peculiar emphasis on the words of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel is intended to illustrate the thesis of the Prologue that He was Himself the Word made flesh. The absence of the Logos theory from the body of the Gospel would thus be counterbalanced by the many references to the 'words.' Against this view, however, it may be urged: (1) that no consistent rule is traceable in the use of hoyes and βημα, as might have been expected if the writer were working out some definite idea; (2) that \(\lambda\)yos in the Prologue bears a twofold significance ('word' and 'reason') which can nowhere be dis-cerned in the later references. The more probable conclusion is that the value assigned to the words of Jesus is connected, not so much with the specific Logos doctrine, as with the general conception that Jesus was one in nature with God. His words were therefore of the same quality as the Divine creative word. They were 'spirit and life'

WORLD WORLD 839

WORLD (κόσμος).—1. The underlying significance of the term κόσμος is that of order. Its probable derivation is from a root κομιδ, which appears in Lat. comptus and in our 'comb.' This order, regularity, neatness receives the widest illustration in larity, neatness receives the widest illustration in classical usage. Thus  $\kappa \delta \sigma \mu o \tau$  includes the idea of decency of behaviour (Æsch. Ag. 521, cf. Soph. Aj. 293), of constitutional government (Thuc. iv. 76), of elegance of attire (Hdt. iii. 123), and so, by just transference, of the world or universe (Plat. Tim. 27 A, cf. Arist. Cal. i. 10), as exhibiting perfection of arrangement, and standing in eternal contrast with chaos. In this, its widest application, it became employed by all writers on natural philosophy, though the meaning oscillates, with some uncertainty, between the earth and the universe generally (see Liddell and Scott, s.v., from which the quotations are taken). It is interesting to observe that ordo in Latin does not, as might have been expected, stand as an equivalent for κόσμος. Its equivalent in Latin is mundus (cf. Sanskr. mund), the root idea of which again is cleanliness, neatness, or order. Thus both the Latin and the Greek pass through, with a singular exactness of analogy, the same transferences of meaning, so that Cicero (Univ. 10) identifies κόσμος and mundus in that widest application of the term above referred to (see Lewis and Short's Dict. s.v. 'Mundus'). There is, however, a further transference of meaning in a use of mundus by classical writers not found in the corresponding use of κόσμος. It is employed (Hor. Sat. i. 3. 112, cf. Luc. Pharsal. v. 469), but somewhat rarely, in a social sense to signify mankind, whereas this application is not given to  $\kappa \delta \sigma \mu \sigma s$  except in so-called Alexandrine Greek. In a word, the conception of order covers every departmental application of the Greek  $\kappa \delta \sigma \mu \sigma s$  and its Latin equivalent.

2. If proof on such an issue were needed by students, the use of the word κόσμος would strikingly show the original way in which NT writers handle and apply such terms. Certainly, to the ancients, with the word κόσμος the vision of the figure of order would be manifest in thought. Generally speaking, in the NT the ancient conceptions of the speaking of the NT the ancient conceptions of the speaking of the NT the ancient conceptions. tion falls so far into the background as sometimes to vanish. But what the word has lost in one way it has gained in other ways, as will be seen upon a brief examination of its employment generally in NT literature.

It is interesting, however, to note that, in the transferred applications of the word, this literature follows the lines of classical usage. Thus zérous is used of women's attire (1 P3°), of the earth (Mt 4° [cf. Lk 4° τῆς εἰπκομείνης] 16°30), and of human society (Jn 1°30). In such illustrations we do not part company with the radical idea of 'order,' but it is only faintly made apparent.

In the Synoptics the term is rarely employed, and the student of the AV must be put on his and the student of the AV must be put on his guard against supposing that, in all cases where the tr. 'world' is used, it stands for  $\kappa \delta \sigma \mu \sigma s$  in the original. In some six cases it stands for aláv, and in two for  $\dot{\eta} \gamma \dot{\eta} o l \kappa \sigma \nu \mu \nu \nu$ . But, as any confusion is sufficiently checked by RVm, the point need not be pursued here. The use of the word, rare as it is in the Synoptics is leavenly free from Lebensine is in the Synoptics, is largely free from Johannine or Pauline sentiment on the idea. It is difficult to find a passage in them in which the term is used absolutely in malam partem, as it is found not only in the writings of St. John and St. Paul, but also in these of St. Peter and St. James. In the parable of the Wheat and the Tares (Mt 13<sup>24-43</sup>) the 'world' appears in no dark or ominous colouring. It is not its cares, but the cares of the age (alw, Mk 4<sup>19</sup>), that choke the word so as to render it unfruitful. When our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount speaks of His disciples as the light of the world (Mk 5<sup>14</sup>), we find the figure interpreted by the parallel expression which precedes it: 'Ye are the salt of the earth' (Mt 5<sup>13</sup>). To declare that the world needs purification and illumination is not a wholesale condemnation of the world. There is in the Synoptics no violence of contrast between it and the Divine society. In its rare occurrences in the Synoptics the world is a sphere in which Christ's disciples live and move and have their being. For them it has its pitfalls (Mt 187), its characteristic dangers, but nowhere does it appear as wholly or inherently evil.

3. When one turns from the Synoptics to St. John's writings, for here it is impossible to separate his Gospel from his letters, the contrast appears startling. Instead of a rare appearance of the startling. Instead of a rare appearance of the term, we find that it occurs some eighty times in the Gospel, and twenty-two times in the First Epistle (A. Plummer, Com. on the Gospel in Cambridge Bible). And with this frequently comes a change in meaning, a change, however, which in the Gospel appears gradual and climactic. For in the Prologue of the Fourth Gospel the term appears with the same lack of colour in which it is painted in the Synoptic Gospels.

The world is indeed seen to be beset by the The world is indeed seen to be beset by the grave fault of indifference to its own darkness. The light came, but it was not recognized. Yet in this lack of welcome His own were involved (Jn 1<sup>11</sup>, cf. 8<sup>12</sup>). The testimony of the Baptist advances the issue a step farther. His recognition of Jesus as the Lamb of God (1<sup>20, 26</sup>) implies his recognition of the purpose of His mission as the worldnition of the purpose of His mission as the world's Saviour from its sin. Later, our Lord's testimony to Nicodemus informs him of the gracious fact of His love towards the world. His deliberate intention in regard to the world was not its condemnation but its salvation. Life, not death, through Him was the Father's eternal purpose (3<sup>16</sup>. <sup>13</sup>, cf. 4<sup>42</sup> 12<sup>27</sup>). Through the type of the manna, our Lord brings Himself, if it may be so expressed, into still closer touch with the world. He is the Bread of heaven which gives life to the world (628). Later, with more awful explicitness, the bread is identified with His flesh, and its offering is on the world's behalf (v.51).

So gracious, indeed, are the Lord's utterances in regard to the world, that twice the group of the disciples appeared unable to distinguish themselves from it. They could not understand in the earlier stage of their discipleship why any manifestation of Jesus should not be made on equal terms to the world as to themselves (74, cf. 142). They omitted to see that a manifestation of Himself could be used only though the medium of least could be made only through the medium of love. A difference, therefore, not only in point of time but also in degree of training, explains any seeming inconsistency in our Lord's teaching in respect of the attitude of the world towards His own. At an earlier stage He declared that the world could not hate His followers,—there was nothing then to excite hostility either by way of their belief or their love (7'). At a later stage the parting of the ways had come. His own had made their final The persecution which He endured was to be theirs also (15<sup>17-20</sup>). All turned upon the identity of themselves with Him. This once established, His own exhibited love and obedience. The world was seen as penetrated by hatred and disobedience. In this awful contrast and conflict, victory was assured for His own, and with victory would come its fruit. He was their surety. Peace and triumph were their lot through Him (16<sup>23</sup>).

But Johannine teaching on the subject of the world cannot be regarded as complete if the First Epistle be ignored. The scope, however, of this Dictionary must limit the inquiry to general references. The doctrinal differences here are explicable, as Bp. Westcott has pointed out (Gospel of St. John, Introd. lxxviii), because the Gospel is related to the Epistle, as history to its comment or application; the former is throughout pre-supposed in the latter. 'The Lord's words in the Gospel have been moulded into aphorisms in the First Epistle'; and in the latter document the Apostle writes, conscious that the Church must be in dire conflict with the characteristic dangers and heresies of the age. It would seem reasonable to regard the teaching of the First Epistle on the regard the teaching of the First Epistie on the world as a commentary, in particular, on our Lord's pregnant utterances on the 'convictions' of the world (Jn 16<sup>8-11</sup>; see Westcott, in loco.). In that passage, the world appears as separate from God, 'yet not past hope.' Our Lord declares there, not that He will convict the world simply as sinful, etc., but that He will show that it lacks the knowledge of what sin rightsouspass and judgment ledge of what sin, righteousness, and judgment really are.

We conclude that the general teaching of St.

John's Gospel on the subject of the world is that it is an order or sphere touching man's life, affecting man's life considered as apart from God; but that in the First Epistle the world is seen more darkly and ominously still: it is not merely regarded as apart from God, but as alien to Him, in direct opposition to His eternal and gracious purposes. St. John would teach us that if it is to be overcome, it must be by powers which lift us above it, and those are the twin powers of love and faith (Liddon, Easter Sermons, No. xxii.).

B. WHITEFOORD.

WORLDLINESS.—The teaching of Christianity concerning worldliness forms one of the most im-portant parts of its practical message to mankind. And yet, more or less strongly marked at different periods, a tendency to serious misconception of this doctrine has probably existed in every generation since the days of Christ. The error into which it has led man is that of regarding the material world and whatever strictly pertains to it, as inherently evil and anti-spiritual. Such a misconception, it is true, did not originate in Christian times, but was taken over by Chris-tianity from earlier systems of religious thought. The source from which it sprang, however, does not affect the gravity of its persistent survival; and inasmuch as the attitude of any faith to the present world must always deeply influence men's estimate of its claims, a clear apprehension of Christ's own teaching on the subject becomes of more than ordinary importance.

I. To reveal the basis of our Lord's doctrine of more than ordinary importance.

worldliness, we must review briefly one or two broad outlines of His message.

1. Christ's teaching concerning the existence of a spiritual realm.—Man has contact with two worlds. (a) Of his communion with the material universe and of the various relationships involved therein, he has by nature a vivid consciousness. This temporal world forms a realm of which, by his birth, he himself has become a part. It has for his possession a special form of life adapted to it. It reveals relationships of its own, as laying their obligation upon him-relationships to a properly constituted authority to be obeyed, and to relatives and friends to be loved. It provides also certain standards of judgment by which the various experiences of its inhabitants are deemed happy or sad, prosperous or unsucessful. (b) But man has contact also with another world—the spiritual. Of his communion with this world he has, by nature, but dim and uncertain comprehension. It was to reveal the truth concerning it that Christ came to earth. Its existence and claims form one of the principal themes of His teaching. Of this realm also it is by a birth that a man becomes a part (Jn 3<sup>3-6</sup>). This realm also has, adapted to it, a special form of life (6<sup>33</sup> 17<sup>3</sup>) which becomes his upon his entrance into it, and which receives its own spiritual sustenance (4<sup>14</sup> <sup>32</sup> <sup>34</sup> 6<sup>35</sup> <sup>48</sup> -5<sup>1</sup> 7<sup>57</sup>). This realm also imposes certain relationships upon him; for it, no less than the other, has its sanctions of authority (Mk 11°, Jn 12¹¹s 18³³-3″) and ties of kinship, both of man with God (Jn 1¹², 1 Jn 3²) and of man with men (Mk 3³⁴-3⁵ || 10²³-3°, Jn 19²-4°). Moreover, this realm also possesses standards of its own by means of which its citizens estimate the events and experiences of their lives (Mt 5<sup>36</sup>: for the contrast offered ences of their lives (ML  $\sigma^{-1}$ : for the contrast officea to the standards of the temporal realm, see Mt  $5^{10-13}$ , and consider the force of  $\delta o \xi a \sigma \theta \hat{\eta}^{\alpha} r a$ , in Jn  $13^{31}$ ). The sphere in which these spiritual relationships are acknowledged and their obligations become operative, was named by Christ the Kingdom of God (or, of Heaven), and it formed the theme even of His earliest teaching (e.g. Mk 1<sup>15</sup>). This invisible world is as real as the visible. It is clearly marked and self-contained (Jn 3<sup>6</sup>). Its citizens possess definite characteristics (Mk 10<sup>15</sup>, Lk 18<sup>16, 17</sup>), and, as it is essentially spiritual in character (Lk 17<sup>20, 21</sup>, Jn 4<sup>23</sup>), a certain fitness is necessary to those who would belong to it (Lk 9<sup>62</sup>). Hence it has to be definitely entered (Mt 7<sup>13, 14</sup>, Mk 10<sup>15</sup> 12<sup>24</sup>, Jn 3<sup>2, 5</sup>).

2. His teaching concerning communion with this spiritual world.—Now, just as man has communion with the temporal world and its life, so he may have communion with this spiritual world and its life. (a) Christ Himself, as man, constantly enjoyed such fellowship. The Gospel narratives reveal Him as holding converse with the Father (Mk 1<sup>26</sup> et passim; see art. COMMUNION), with angels (Mk 1<sup>13</sup>, cf. Mt 26<sup>25</sup>), and with departed spirits of holy men (Mk 9<sup>26</sup>). Indeed, this realization of His communion with the unseen realm formed the basis of His sense of mission (Lk 2<sup>49</sup>, Jn 7<sup>16</sup> 8<sup>161, 29</sup> 16<sup>32</sup>) and the source from which He derived His strength in suffering (Jn (a) 18<sup>11</sup>). (b) And the fellowship with the spiritual realm which Christ thus exemplified in His own life upon earth, He enjoined upon His followers also (Jn 15<sup>45</sup>, cf. 6<sup>78-35</sup> ct passim). While they must live before men their outward life in contact with the visible universe and its affairs, they possess also an inner life which must be lived 'in secret'—in contact with the unseen (Mt 6<sup>1-18</sup> 10<sup>19, 20</sup>).

3. The twofold communion.—Man, therefore, belongs to two worlds, and may have communion. with both. But just as, possessing a twofold nature, carnal and spiritual, he knows that the nature, carnal and spiritual, he know that the spiritual is the higher, so, enjoying a twofold com-munion, he is to learn that the spiritual fellowship must take precedence, its realization being his supreme duty and the end of his creation. Vet, supreme duty and the end of his creation. as in the freedom of his will he is able to cultivate the carnal in him at the expense of the spiritual, so too he is free, as the whole appeal of Christ's teaching presupposes, to choose for himself with which realm, the temporal or the spiritual, his fellowship shall be the more real and intense.

II. CHRIST'S TEACHING UPON WORLDLINESS.

—1. Christ encouraged no indifference to the claims of the temporal world.—There is an unworldliness which so emphasizes spiritual realities as to undervalue the material universe and its lawful concerns. This attitude, which, as we have hinted, has found frequent and varied expression among His followers, derives no support from the life or teaching of Christ Himself. The beauty and charm of the visible world appealed to Him

(Mt 625.28). Its incidents furnished illustrations (Mt 6<sup>26,26</sup>). Its incidents lumished illustrations for His sermons (Mk 4<sup>3</sup>, Mt 25<sup>14</sup>). He participated in its festivals (Jn 2<sup>162</sup>), and contrasted Himself with one whose asceticism disparaged its good cheer (Mt 11<sup>18, 19</sup>). Again, the claims of this world's lawful authorities always received His ready acknowledgment. Respect for them was scrupulously evinced alike in His advice (Mk 12<sup>17</sup>). Further in His scrupulously evinced alike in His advice (Mk 12<sup>17</sup>) and in His example (Mt 17<sup>27</sup>). Further, in His thought, the welfare of men is by no means a merely spiritual matter. On the contrary, the social obligations imposed by His religion form one of His most constant themes. Love towards others is the very test by which His true disciples can be identified (Mt 5<sup>13-48</sup>, cf. 1 Jn 2<sup>2-11</sup> 4<sup>20</sup> etc.), and that love is to find expression not in vapid sentiment, but in whole-hearted service (Mk 10<sup>126</sup>, Mt 22<sup>26-29</sup>, Lk 10<sup>207</sup>.) Indeed, Christ teaches that this love and service to man are the criterion of this love and service to man are the criterion of love and service to God (Mt 25<sup>40,46</sup>), while in several suggestive passages He even hints that the earthly life forms in some sense an interpretation of the spiritual life (see Mk 2<sup>8, 10, 11</sup>, Mt 18<sup>10</sup>). Christ therefore calls His followers not to neglect the temporal world, much less to despise it, but to recognize that they have a function to fulfil in it by permeating every part of its life with beauty and truth (Mt 5<sup>13-16</sup> 13<sup>25</sup>, Jn 17<sup>15</sup>). So far, indeed, is He from any underestimation of the present life, that we know of no teacher in any age whose principles, carried into effect, would so ameliorate the material condition of mankind in all its individual aspects and social relationships.

2. Christ uttered no condemnation of worldly possessions.—See art. WEALTH.

3. A false antithesis.—It is clear, therefore, that in our study of the Christian doctrine of worldliness we must eliminate what is now seen to be a false antithesis. In view of the unfortunate ambiguity in meaning both of the Greek and of the English word, it is necessary to define closely the sense in which Christianity sets the 'world' in opposition to its own life and principles. The Christian teacher has to distinguish two forms of contrast. There is the contrast of difference or distinction, and there is the contrast of opposition. It is in the former sense alone, as our Lord's own life and words declare, that the material is set by Christianity over against the spiritual. The contrast of opposition established by Christianity is never between the spiritual and the material, but always between the spiritual and the antispiritual. The material, it is true, may be made the instrument of the anti-spiritual; but the two are essentially distinct, and confusion between them, signally absent from the Gospel teaching, must never be condoned in its exponents. It is of the utmost significance in this connexion that our Lord deliberately refused to recognize a contrast of opposition between the powers of the heavenly and those of the earthly realm (Mk 12<sup>12-17</sup> || Jn 6<sup>13</sup>, cf. Ro 13<sup>7</sup>): the antithesis He accepted was that of the Heavenly King and 'the prince of this world' (Jn 12<sup>31</sup> 14<sup>30</sup> 16<sup>11</sup> in each case ὁ ἀρχων τοῦ κόσμου οτ ὁ τοῦ κόσμου ἀρχων). The 'world' He condemned is not the material world, in which He limself took delight, or its claims, which He Himself took delight, or its claims, which He loyally acknowledged, or (in themselves) its possessions, of which He spoke with guarded moderation, but a certain spirit of the world fundamentally antagonistic to man's highest life, and the men in whom that spirit has established its abode (cf. the whom that spirit has established its about (if. the careful definition in 1 Jn 2<sup>16</sup> and that implicit in Jn 12<sup>21</sup>). It is between Christ's Kingdom and the 'world' in this sense that there is opposition, and in this case the opposition is final and complete (Jn  $15^{18.19}$   $16^{23}$ —note the terms of the contrast,  $\epsilon r \tau \hat{\varphi} \kappa \delta \sigma \mu \varphi$  and  $\epsilon r \epsilon \mu o (-17^{14}, 1 \text{ Jn } 2^{15} 3^{13} 4^{4-6})$ .

 The consequent meaning of worldliness. The accurate recognition of Christ's attitude to the temporal world at once yields the accurate conception of worldliness. Worldliness will clearly ception of worldliness. Worldliness will clearly consist in devotion to 'the world,' not in any sense of that ambiguous term, but in the particular sense in which Christ revealed it to be evil. In-asmuch, therefore, as 'the world,' in the only significant of the sense in the control of t nification in which He condemned it, is the spirit of antagonism (whether expressed as a 'principle or personified in individuals) to His spiritual kingdom, worldliness must be the possession of this spirit, and the practice of worldliness must be its manifestation. In view of persistent misconception of the teaching of Christianity on this subject, clearness at this point, even at the risk of repetition, is of the utmost importance. Worldliness does not consist in a love of the temporal world and its concerns, for between the Kingdom and 'the world' in this sense Christ acknowledges no necessary opposition, and a man may so use both realms as to fulfil the rightful claims of each both realms as to fulfil the rightful claims of each without setting them in any inevitable antithesis. Nor does worldliness lie in the performance or non-performance of any particular actions (Mk 2<sup>18.24</sup> 3<sup>4</sup> 7<sup>3.8.15.21</sup>, Lk 11<sup>28-24</sup>, Jn 5<sup>10</sup> 7<sup>22.24</sup> et passim); for, since it is the possession of a certain spirit, the most scrupulous punctiliousness in outward conduct may coexist with the deepest unspirituality (Mt 27<sup>6</sup>, Jn 12<sup>8.6</sup> 18<sup>28</sup> 19<sup>51</sup>; cf. the significant pronouncement in Mt 21<sup>28-31</sup>), and the truest unworldliness with apparent indifference to its formal expression with apparent indifference to its formal expression (11<sup>18</sup> 19). It is quite true that a love of the temporal world and indulgence in particular actions closely associated with it, may constitute manifestations of worldliness. A realm not evil in itself may easily become the medium of evil, and so, owing to an undue emphasis, man's fellowship with the temporal world may, both by its positive and by its negative influence, prove injurious to his fellowship with the spiritual. Such a misuse of the two realms inevitably turns the contrast of distinction between them into one of opposition. This result, however, is reached not because of any anti-spiritual quality intrinsic in the material realm itself, but through the employment of that realm as a vehicle of the anti-spiritual. The essence of worldliness lies deeper than any particular form in which it may be expressed, and, according to the Christian teaching, its essence is found in the mind—in whatever form embodied—which leads a man to identify himself with that 'world' which is anti-spiritual in its nature and influence.

5. The manifestation of worldliness.—Such a self-identification is revealed in practice by the point at which a man lays the chief emphasis of his life. As our review of Christ's teaching has shown, man has communion with two worlds—the temporal and the spiritual. Right and lawful, however, as the first communion may be, there come frequent crises in which its interests are found to be in rivalry to those of the higher fellowship. To cling in such crises to the lower communion, in other words, to sacrifice the spiritual to the temporal, this is to be worldly, for this is to make the temporal world, innocent and good in itself, a vehicle of the anti-spiritual. It is unnecessary, and, in the strict sense, even impossible, to identify particular actions as in themselves involving the anti-spiritual; for, as we have seen, worldliness in practice is the possession of a certain spirit, and there is no action which must necessarily embody that spirit nor any which cannot be made a medium for it. The whole question of worldliness in action is ultimately one of arrangement and precedence. The things of the temporal world are right in their right place, but that is the second place in a man's life. What Christ teaches is that they must never be allowed the first place, for that belongs to God (see Mt 6<sup>23</sup>, where both elements are recognized and the true order is laid down; and for a striking illustration in O'T, 1 K 3<sup>4-18</sup>). The practice of worldliness, therefore, consists in such an arrangement of these two elements in life as, from the standpoint of God, is false. It is the laying of a disproportionate emphasis upon the temporal, to the impoverishment of the spiritual, elements in life. In some cases this may be recognized by the entire exclusion of the spiritual (Lk 12<sup>15-21</sup>); in others by its subjection to the temporal (Mt 8<sup>21</sup> 10<sup>37, 28</sup>, Mk 5<sup>37</sup>, Lk 14<sup>15-24</sup>, Jn 3<sup>19</sup>). The error, however, always lies not in the cultivation of communion with the temporal world, but in the untrue emphasis laid upon it; in the failure to see that, while many things appear desirable, only one thing is needful (Lk 10<sup>41, 42</sup>, cf. Mt 13<sup>44-46</sup>); in the self-identification with that 'world' which is the direct antithesis of the Kingdom of heaven.

6. The Christian's true relation to the temporal world. — Our Lord's example and teaching, thus briefly reviewed, enable us to infer the Christian's true relation to the temporal world. (a) Like his Master, he will be fully cognizant of its charms and fully responsive to its lawful claims. Christianity is a religion calculated to make true lovers of Nature, and to produce good fathers, good husbands, good rulers, good servants, good men of business and men of public spirit. Those who have truly learnt the mind of Christ will never shrink from their obligations to the full-orbed life of the world in which He has set them. On the contrary, it is their simple duty to see that every sphere of human life, public and private, individual and social, shall be permeated by His spirit (Mt 5<sup>12, 14</sup> 13<sup>23</sup>). (b) Yet, while the claims of the temporal world will receive their due acknowledgment, the main stress of the Christian's life will lie elsewhere. He is in the world; but, like his Master (Jn 8<sup>23</sup>), he is not of it (17<sup>14-18</sup>). He will mix freely even in its darker scenes, but without sharing their spirit (Mk 2<sup>16</sup>). For he is no longer a slave to that spirit: he has acquired the independence of real freedom (Jn 8<sup>31-36</sup>). Indeed, his whole attitude to the temporal world has been changed. He no longer regards himself as a permanent holder, but as a temporary steward, ever awaiting the return of an unseen Lord (Mk 1335-37). He thus maintains his fellowship with the two realms to which he belongs, but there is no division in his mind (μη μετεωρίζεσθε in Lk 12<sup>29</sup> according to interpretation of AV and RV: cf. the supreme submission of Mk 14<sup>36</sup>) as to their comparative claims. His real world is the spiritual world. Whether he is giving alms, praying, fasting, or whatever he is doing, his true life is a life lived 'in secret' away from the gaze of men (Mt 6<sup>1-18</sup>). (c) And it is the claim of this unseen life that dictates his policy in all his earthly concerns. If it require that he sacrifice his own temporal fame (cf. Jn 329. 30) or temporal possessions (Mt 9°), he does so with joy. If, on the contrary, it require that he retain these and employ them for the advancement of the Kingdom, he is equally, but no more, ready to obey. While some men make a temporal use of eternal conditions (21<sup>12ff</sup>. and ||), he makes an eternal use of temporal conditions (Mt 25**, Lk 16**-1). While some interpret spiritual facts by the material (Mt 16**, Jn 6**-2*), he seeks the key to material facts in the spiritual. Like his Lord, he never condemns as inherently evil the things which are temporal and material, but throughout his life he subjects them to what is spiritual and eternal (cf. 2 Co 418). And herein he has found life's true interpretation (cf. Jn 663).

WRITING.—The allusions to writing in the Gospels may be classified under four headings, none of which requires any elaborate discussion.

1. In one series of passages ('Moses wrote,' or 'it is written') the reference is to the OT Scriptures, whose letter was held to be authoritative on matters of faith and morals. This view of Scripture was due mainly to the influence of the earlier Rabbis, and naturally it dominated more or less the thinking of the primitive Church, whose one sacred book was the OT. But the formula 'as it is written' had already acquired a juristic sense, as may be seen from numerous inscriptions and papyri (Deissmann, Bible Studies, pp. 112-114, 249, 250), so that the LXX translators were not striking out a new line in rendering Torah often by νόμος. 'A religion of documents—considered even historically—is a religion of law.' It is in this legal or semitechnical sense that Pilate is said to have written the charge against Jesus (Jn 19<sup>19</sup> etc.), while another metaphorical application occurs in Lk 10<sup>20</sup> 'rejoice that your names are written (or enrolled) in heaven.' The latter passage alludes to the well-known Rabbinic and apocalyptical conception of the heavenly books or registers, a figure employed to denote the indelible mercy of God and the certainty of the believer's relation to Himself, as a citizen of the heavenly state. To have one's name written in the heavenly archives, or inscribed on the Divine roll of citizens, was equivalent to the enjoyment of a safe and sure lot with God. On the general use of γραφή in the Gospels and Epistles, see art Scripture and Exp.T viv. 11933 475-478.

see art. Scripture, and ExpT xiv. [1903] 475-478.

2. Twice the phrase is used of the composition of the Gospels (Lk 1³, Jn 20<sup>30, 31</sup> and 21<sup>24, 25</sup>), the object of the undertaking in both cases being carefully explained as practical, not literary. To confirm faith, if not to awaken it, is the aim of a written Gospel. Thus an implicit divergence from the above-mentioned sense of γραφή emerges here. No writer of the Gospel claims a juristic authority for his statements. There is nothing legal or formal about their contents (cf. Moffatt, Historical New Testament², pp. 42 f., 258, 259, 537, 538), nor, as the very persistence of oral tradition suggests, was there any notion of setting them up as infallible tests. Faith sprang from hearing rather than from reading in those days of primitive Christianity. The rise of written records was late, and even their growing prominence did not as yet shift the centre of gravity and influence from living intercourse to scholastic or doctrinal prepossessions. The living voice, the fellowship of the Christian Church, the witness of Apostles—these prevented anything like degeneration into a book religion. The litera scripta had its place and merits. But it was produced in and for the Church. And not until it became isolated from the Church did its abuse begin. 'For the general principles of any study you may learn by books at home; but the detail, the colour, the tone, the air, the life which makes it live in us, you must eatch all these from those in whom it lives already' (Newman). Thus the rise of written records in Christianity introduced a real problem, which is soluble only upon a proper view of the mutual relations between living intercourse, such as the Church provides, and literary standards and sources (cf. Tolstoi's Essays, 170 f.).

3. The ordinary use of writing is twice mentioned, in connexion with domestic (Lk 183) and business (166.7) affairs. The three R's were taught in Jewish schools, so that writing would be a fairly common accomplishment, indispensable, of course, to the higher branches of trade and culture (cf. Edersheim's Sketches of Jewish Social Life, p. 130 f.). See art. Education.

4. Jesus Himself is only once said to have written—and that upon the dust (Jn 8<sup>6,8</sup>), stooping and scrawling with His finger on the ground to conceal His embarrassment and to avoid answering the brazen questions of the woman's accusers (cf. Ecce Homo, ch. ix.). It is idle to suppose that He wrote any sentence, or to conjecture what that sentence was, whether the sins of His interrogators or some text like Mt 5<sup>3</sup> or Ps 50<sup>16</sup>. It is the action and nothing else that is significant. Jesus stooped to write, in short, by one of those natural gestures which a pure-minded man, seated on the ground, would employ to hide his confusion and put by a question which should never have been asked.

YOKE.—The yoke (ζυγός, Mt 1120.) supplied Jesus with one of His agricultural metaphors (cf. Mt 13<sup>26</sup>, Lk 12<sup>17</sup> 15<sup>14</sup>, Jn 15<sup>1</sup>). It was 'a bar which connects two of a kind usually—as the ox-yoke—fastened by bows on the necks of a pair of oxen and by thongs to the horns or the foreheads of the oxen. It consists generally of a piece of timber hollowed or made curving near each end, and fitted with bows for receiving the necks of the oxen, by which means two are connected for drawing. From a ring or hook in the bow a chain extends to the thing to be drawn' (Lloyd's Ency. Dict.). Another use of the word is found in Lk 14<sup>19</sup> (ξεῦγος, tr. 'pair' in 2<sup>24</sup>), where it means a pair of draught-oxen. Now, while the facts of farm-life supplied the form for this metaphor of Jesus, it was not there alone that He found the idea of the metaphor. When from the fields His eye turned to the Scriptures to survey the story of His people, on many a page the yoke met His vision. There it is, in prose, poetry, and prophecy; about it have gathered the country's glory and grief. To itself it has harnessed the people's experiences. Ideas of opposing characterjoy and woe, freedom and slavery, peace and war, plenty and poverty—are symbolized by it (Dt 28.48, Job 13 42.12, Jer 2.20, Is 58.6, I K 12.4, La 3.27). Moreover, it is in His treatment of those bitter-sweet memories and realities of life that the teaching of Jesus, under this figure of speech, touches and keeps a lonely sublimity. Only once (Mt 11<sup>2st.</sup>) He uses the metaphor. Now it is in everyday use. For He 'touched nothing that He did not adorn.' And He so adorned the yoke as to draw after it the whole gospel.

When Jesus turned His gaze from the fields of industrial life, and from the book of remembrance of the past to the book of the life of His own generation, He discovered a nation under the yoke, a race under the harrow. He hit the mark when He spoke of yokes. His audience was made up of those who were wearing yokes of all sorts and sizes, but no man with his own yoke harnessed on exactly as his neighbour's. On the other hand, that audience was suffering under an intolerable strain. Three yokes were galling and killing them —(1) the yoke of the Law, (2) of Rome, (3) of sin. Their leaders (Mt 234) bound grievous burdens on the people's shoulders; nor would they remove them. Of some it was the constant temptation to throw off the yoke of the foreigner. The Zealots (Lk 615) were most restive under Rome. They were the political Nationalists of the day. Again, who of them all was not 'sold under sin' (Ro 714)!

These were the yokes of the people. The yoke of Jesus was the will of the Father. He wore it always, never worked without it; never against it, always with it (Jn 829). Once He asked thrice if He might take it off (Mt 26200-) for the road was steep. The yoke of Jesus was the welfare of man. He came to serve (Mk 1040). To be Saviour was at once the lowliest, loftiest, and loneliest way of working out the welfare of man. And this yoke was tied on with cords of love (Jn 131) unto the end. The humanity of Jesus was His yoke. He was, not the angel (He 29.16), but the man Christ Jesus (1 Ti 26); and He did the perfect will of the Father under this yoke, frail but firm—the body of His humiliation.

YOUNG MAN.—In the Gospels we have on four occasions incidents of importance described, in which 'a young man' (νεανίσκος, not νεανίας [as in Ac 7<sup>51</sup> of Saul, 20<sup>5</sup> of Eutychus, 23<sup>17</sup> of St. Paul's nephewll is one of the figures

1. St. Matthew (19<sup>20.22</sup>; cf. Mk 10<sup>17</sup>, Lk 18<sup>18</sup>) describes by this name the 'ruler' who asked our Lord what he must do to inherit eternal life. It adds to the pathos of the scene to know that this man, who 'went away sorrowful' because he could not give up his great possessions in the quest for life, was still so youthful as to be called rearloror. He had not reached the prime of life,* when the love of money had cankered his heart and soul.

2. The widow's only son at Nain, who was being carried out to burial when our Lord touched the bier and raised him to life, was comparatively young: our Lord called him rearforce when He bade him arise (Lk 714). An additional touch is given to the beauty of the miracle if we may infer the mother's early widowhood and the youth's career of promise cut short, for which the Saviour's gift of life restored (touch arise, v.15) made ample and unexpected compensation.

3. St. Mark (14<sup>$1.52</sup>) records a brief and somewhat mysterious incident, which occurred on the way from Gethsemane to the high priest's palace on the night of the Betrayal. When 'all the disciples forsook him and fled' there 'followed with him' still 'a certain young man' who had 'a linen cloth cast about him, over his naked body.' Perhaps he had been roused from sleep that night, and so had nothing but his bed-robe on as he rushed from the house to see what was taking place at the garden. And when some of the 'multitude with swords and staves' who arrested Christ tried to lay hold on him also, he escaped, but left the linen cloth behind him in their grasp. Evidently the slight event had some special association for St. Mark with the memories of that night, and it has been conjectured that the rearlands is, in fact, the Evangelist himself; and, further, that he was a member of the household where the Last Supper had just been eaten, perhaps the son of the okrobondry (v. 14). Others, with less probability, have wished to identify him with St. John or with St. James the Lord's brother (see Swete's notes, in loc.). In art he is sometimes represented as the keeper of the garden (l'ortolano: see Mrs. Jameson's Hist. of our Lord in Art, vol. ii. p. 43). Bengel's inference (locuples igitur erat, Mt. 118) tallies well with the idea that he was John Mark (see Ac 1212).

* The word **ex** stands for any age from boyhood up to 40 years. See Liddell and Soott, s.v., and cf. Swete's note on Mr. 1017

4. According to Mk 185, he who appeared to the women at the sepulchre on the morning of the Resurrection was 'a young man sitting on the right side, arrayed in a white robe.' In St. Matthew's account he is described as 'an angel of the Lord' (28²), while St. Luke tells us of 'two men in shining garments' who spoke to them (24¹: but in v.²² 'a vision of angels'). In apt illustration of St. Mark's version Swete quotes 2 Mac 3²². ³² δύο ἐφά-νησαν αὐτῷ νεανίαι . . . διαπρεπεῖε τὴν περιβολὴν . . . οἱ αὐτοὶ νεανίαι πάλιν ἐφάνησαν τῷ 'Ηλιοδώρῳ ἐν ταῖε αὐταῖε ἐσθήσεσι ἐστολισμέσο; and Jos. Ant. V. viii. 2, where the angel who appears to Manoah's wife is φάντασμα . . . νεανία καλῷ παραπλήσιον μεγάλῳ. Cf. also Evang. Petr. §§ 9, 11, and 13.

ZACCHRUS (Zaxxalos; Heb. '3! 'pure').—The graphic narrative of Lk 191-10 tells us all that we know of Zacchæus, and his name does not occur elsewhere in the NT. The importance of Jericho as a trade centre, the abundance and value of whose products called forth the enthusiastic approbation of Josephus (BJ IV. viii. 2, 3), required the employment of a considerable number of tax-collectors, and these were under the general direction of Zacchæus (cf. dpx(reldyrs, v.²), who may, in point of fact, have been himself the fortunate leaseholder of the customs of that particular district. In other words, he may have purchased from the authorities the right to be as exacting as he pleased in his demands upon the people, provided he knew enough of the law to avoid the risk of exposure. There is no reason to believe that Zacchæus was a notoriously bad representative of his class; but, on the other hand, having regard to that remorseful cry of his which seems to have been the product of an awakened conscience (v.³), it does not appear that his methods were always strictly equitable. He was, so far as one may gather, a publicanus (see art. Publican) of more than average respectability, yet not above some of the questionable ways associated with his profession. To paint his character in lurid colours, as distinguished by unusual heartlessness and selfishness, is not in accordance with the impression conveyed by the narrative.

One is never quite safe in venturing upon a pronouncement with regard to motives—they are generally so curiously mixed; and possibly a variety of motives contributed to the impulse which brought Zacchæus into contact with Jesus that day. But while it might be too much to say that higher motives were entirely absent, it is quite obvious that the part played by a naturally lively curiosity was not inconsiderable. In this connexion, the contrast between Matthew sitting at the receipt of custom and Zacchæus leaving all thoughts of business behind and climbing a tree with eager speed, is sufficiently great to indicate a vital difference in character between the two men.

More interesting than the attitude of Zacchæus towards Jesus is the attitude of Jesus towards him. If we look for an explanation of the wonderful transformation, implicated in the resolve in which Zacchæus gave expression to his feelings, we find it, undoubtedly, in the delightful frankness of Christ's first salutation, and in His courageous brushing aside of popular prejudice. In no other way could He have so completely gained, first, the attention, and then the heart of one whom society united in passing by. Nothing, surely, could be more remarkable than the delicate insight which led Jesus to choose Zacchæus as His host. It was an irresistible touch, and, mingled with the other happy recollections of that day, it would abide in the mind of the publican as a peculiarly grateful memory.

ZACHARIAH. -- See BARACHIAH.

ZACHARIAS (Zaχaρlas). — Father of John the Baptist (Lk 15-20. 17-20); a Jewish priest, who was an old man at the close of the reign of Herod the Great (B.C. 4). 'The strawberry grows underneath the nettle,' and, even in that evil time of wickedness in high places in Church and State, there lived in Palestine no inconsiderable number of just and devout persons both among priests and people. Of such was Zacharias. A Jewish priest, a member of the family of Abijah, Zacharias had been so careful to observe the law regarding the marriage of priests (Lv 217-14), that he chose for wife one of the sacerdotal house, a daughter of Aaron (v. 3), named after Aaron's wife (Ex 6<sup>22</sup>), Eliasbeth, who was as pious as himself. They were righteous not only in the sight of men but of God, and blameless in their care to observe all His commandments and ordinances; but notwithstanding this, and the promise of God by Jeremiah (Jer 33<sup>18</sup>), and their eager desire, and Zacharias' lifelong prayer (v. 18), their union was not blessed with offspring. It was due to Eliasbeth's barrenness (v. 7); and she keenly felt the reproach which it occasioned (v. 20), for it was a common opinion among the Jews that childlessness was God's punishment for guilt. They had both reached old age when the miraculous event occurred which surpassed all they could have looked for.

which surpassed all they could have looked for.

of Judah to fulfil in the Temple at Jerusalem his week of service; and it fell to his lot to perform the very special duty of burning incense in the Holy Place, separated only by the veil from the Holy of Holies. It was a very notable occasion in a priest's life, which did not come at all to many a priest (it is said there were 20,000 of them altogether about this period), and it was not likely the lot would ever fall on him again to offer it. The offering of incense was symbolical of prayer (Rev 58); the people worshipping in the courts outside were praying while the smoke was rising from his censer within (v.10); it was impossible that he should not be praying too, and if only by the force of long habit, the old petition rose once more to his Suddenly there stood in front of him, on the right side of the altar of incense (v.11), where no mortal man should be, an angel of the Lord. In the presence of the supernatural, Zacharias feared and trembled; but the angel reassured him, told him that his prayer was heard, that his wife Elisa-beth should bear him a son, whom he should live to see, and name John (= 'the grace of Jehovah'), to see, and name John (= 'the grace or Jenovan'), which would be no barren title, but describe his character and mission: 'he shall be great in the sight of the Lord' (cf. Mt 11", Lk 720). This son must be brought up as a Nazirite in the highest form of Levitical devotion (Nu 64, Jg 134, La 47, Am 212); he should, like another Elijah (1 K 1837), turn many of the children of Israel unto the Lord, and be the forerunner, as foretold by Malachi, to Messiah Himself (vv. 15-17).

Zacharias had not the faith of Abraham, who staggered not through unbelief (Ro 419) at a promise of God exactly similar, 'involving human generation, but prophetically announced and supernatural' (Alford). He asked for a sign (κατὰ τί;), and pointed out the difficulties in the way. Some (c.g. Bruce) have expressed surprise that 'so natural a hesitation' should be treated, and punished, as a sin'; but to whom much is given, of him much shall be required. Others have asked why Zacharias should be censured here, and not the Virgin Mary should be censured here, and not the virgin Mary  $(vv.^{34.58})$ , not observing that hers was not a question of doubt, 'Whereby shall I know?' but a request for direction  $(\pi\hat{\omega}s\ \ell\sigma\tau a\ \tau\hat{\omega}\tau\sigma c)$ , 'How is it to be brought about?'—a question implying faith as to the event itself. She got a sign too, though she had not asked one; but hers was joyful, Zacharias' punitive, yet merciful. 'Thou shalt be dumb,' not only as one stupefied with wonder, but also 'unable only as one stupefied with wonder, but also 'unable to speak'; yet for a season merely, till, at the proper time, the promise has its fulfilment. Thus, on the threshold of the Gospel, at the very outset of its great series of miracles, is unbelief chastised. The soul that will not believe shall not be allowed to speak (cf. 2 Co 4<sup>13</sup>).

It was not, the Talmudists inform us, the custom of the priests, when officiating inside the Holy Place, to make their own devotions long, lest the people outside should be anxious; but Zacharias' interview with Gabriel, and perhaps the feelings it awakened, caused him to delay. The worshippers in the Temple courts marvelled why he tarried so long; the thought likely to occur to them was that God had slain the priest as unworthy (Bruce); and when at last he did make his appearance, he could neither explain the reason for his delay, nor give them the Aaronic benediction (Nu 6<sup>22-24</sup>), which was pronounced after every morning and evening sacrifice by the priest with uplifted hands, the people responding to it with a loud Amen (Keil, Bibl. Archaeol.). Like the dying St. Columba before the altar at Iona, though for a different reason, Zacharias signed with his hand the blessing which he could not speak (v.22). As soon as the days of his ministration were accomplished, he returned to his home; the tokens of his wife's pregnancy soon added a sign of joy to the sign of punishment which he bore about with him. The promised child was born, but the chastisement was not taken off till the hour arrived when he had his predicted function to fulfil, by calling the infant by his appointed

Godet remarks on the pleasant picture of family life presented by the scene of the Baptist's circumcision. It had been a custom since the birth of Isaac (who received his name at his circumcision) to give a child his name on the same day in which he was signed as one of God's people: for a similar reason, Christian children are named on the occasion of their entrance by baptism into the Church. A difficulty which some have felt, that Zacharias was dumb only and not deaf, yet is treated by the company as if unable to hear, is met by Olshausen with the remark that these two afflictions go so frequently together, that men easily accustom themselves to treat dumb persons as deaf.

The heart of Tanharian had been eathering and hear eathering and heart of Tanharian had been eathering eathering.

The heart of Zacharias had been gathering thoughts to itself through all those months of silence, and no sooner was his mouth opened than silence, and no sooner was his mouth opened than he poured forth to God the hymn of priestly thanksgiving which we call, from its first word in the Latin version, Benedictus (wh. see). Here we need only note in it an evident allusion to his own name (signifying 'Remembered by Jehovah') and his wife's (Elisabeth = Eli-sheba = 'the oath of God')—'to remember his holy covenant; the oath which he sware to our father Abraham' (Lk 1<sup>72, 73</sup>).

Nothing is said of Zacharias after this. The statement of several of the Fathers (Origen, Greg. Nyss., Cyr., and Pet. Alex.), though accepted by Baronius, that this Zacharias was slain by Herod between the Temple and the brazen altar, has no historical basis; it is a mere guess to explain the difficulty, that whereas many of the prophets were martyred at a later date than Zechariah the son of Jehoiada (2 Ch 2429), yet our Lord, summing up the list of such murders, begins with Abel and ends with Zechariah (Mt 2325). See Barachhal. Zacharias having been by this mistake made a martyr, his relics were forthcoming, and Cornelius a Lapide speaks of seeing and venerating his head in the Lateran basilica at Rome.

JAMES COOPER. ZAREPHATH (AV Sarepta).—A town of the narrow rocky Phenician coast, 9 miles S.W. of Sidon, 17 miles N. of Tyre, and 60 miles directly N. of Nazareth, whence NT reference is made to the perchal SO feet high on a stoop hills. it. Perched 500 feet high on a steep hillside a mile from the coast road, the modern shrunken hamlet looks down upon the traveller riding through a mile of the ruins of the ancient Zarephath, which once as a populous city extended to the sea, was provided with walls, and had a commodious harbour, now filled with sand and ruins.

While, in the theoretical division of the Holy Land among the twelve tribes by Joshua, Zarephath did, 'even unto great Sidon,' 'and to the fortified city of Tyre' (Jos 19<sup>281</sup>.), it, together with the most of Asher's territory, remained almost wholly Phœnician and Gentile. St. Luke's report of Christ's sermon at Nazareth distinctly connects Zarephath with Sidon, as do the LXX and MT in the account of Elijah's sustenance by the widow there. Evangelist—apparently the only Gentile-Christian NT writer—seizes as does no other upon the thought that the boundless grace of God has been extended in certain typical cases to remote Gentiles, even to the superseding and exclusion of those who were of the stock of Abraham and dwelt within the Holy Land. The choice, among all others, of the widow of pagan Phœnician Zarephath, and of Naaman the leper of heathen Syrian Damascus, to receive the favours of the prophets Elijah and Elisha, filled the crabbed synagogue hearers of Nazareth with wrath and murder (Lk 425.).

ZEAL.—It is not easy to distinguish zeal (Gr. ζήλος from ζέω 'to boil') from enthusiasm (which see); but, as regards the derivation, the former indicates the character, the latter the source of the inward state; and, as regards the meaning, the former lays stress on the volitional, the latter on the emotional aspect of the complex condition of soul. As 'ardour in embracing, pursuing, or defending' an object, it is ascribed to Phinehas (Nu 25<sup>11. 13</sup>), Elijah (1 Mac 2<sup>38</sup>), the Jewish people (Ac 22<sup>30</sup>, Ro 10<sup>31</sup>). St. Paul claims it for himself (Ac 22<sup>30</sup>, 2 Co 11<sup>3</sup>, Gal 1<sup>14</sup>, Ph 3<sup>6</sup>), and commends it in the Corinthians (2 Co 7<sup>7. 11</sup> 9<sup>3</sup>) and Epaphras (Col 4<sup>13</sup>, variant reading for labour). The same Greek word is used in the bad sense of jealousy, which is condemned in the Apostolic writings (1 Co 3<sup>3</sup>, 2 Co 12<sup>30</sup>, Gal 5<sup>30</sup>, Ja 3<sup>14. 16</sup>). A quotation from the Paslms (69<sup>30</sup>) is applied to Jesus to describe the impression made on the disciples by the first cleansing of the Temple (Jn 2<sup>17</sup>). This may throw some light on the problem of the repetition of the act at the close of the ministry (Mt 21<sup>12-17</sup>, Mk 11<sup>12-18</sup>, Lk 19<sup>45. 46</sup>), as the first may have been due to His fresh enthusiasm for His vocation, the second may have been a more deliberate assertion of His Messianic claim. As zeal in the fulfilment of His purpose is ascribed to God (2 K 19<sup>31</sup>, Is 9<sup>7</sup> 37<sup>32</sup> 59<sup>17</sup> 63<sup>16</sup>, Ezk 5<sup>13</sup>), the mood itself as well as the occasion of it was worthy of Jesus as the Som of God.

From this term is derived the name of one of the Jewish parties, the Zealots (which see), to which, as his surname indicates, Simon the disciple (Lk 613, Ac 113) had belonged. The zeal of Jesus for the Temple may have been what drew Simon to Him.

ZEALOT (Gr. ξηλωτής) occurs in Lk 6<sup>15</sup> and Ac 1<sup>18</sup> as the designation of Simon, one of the Twelve. as the designation of Simon, one of the Twelve. In the lists given by Mt. and Mk. the equivalent 'Cananæan' (Kararaĉo') is used. The Zealots were the rigorous Nationalists, the party of violent opposition to Roman domination. Josephus (Ant. XVIII. i. 6) calls them a 'fourth sect of Jewish philosophy,' and says that 'Judas the Galilæan was the founder.' He adds: 'These men agree in all things with the Pharisaic notions; but they have an invioled attachment to liberty and say have an inviolable attachment to liberty, and say that God is to be their only Ruler and Lord'; he speaks of their 'immovable resolution' and their indifference to suffering and death. These qualities were all abundantly illustrated in the final struggle at Jerusalem and at Masada. Edersheim (LT) . 237 ff.) dates the rise of the party from the accession of Herod the Great, and the activity of guerilla bands in Galilee under the leadership of one Ezechias. 'It was in fact a revival of the Maccabean movement, perhaps more fully in its national than in its religious aspect.' Plummer 'St. Luke' in ICC) attaches more importance to the religious aspect of the movement :- 'The Zealots date from the time of the Maccabees as a class who attempted to force upon others their own rigorous interpretations of the Law.' In the later stages of the Jewish history the party grew more violent. Its ringleaders were known as the Sicarii, and their overthrow of all moderating leadership sealed the doom of Jerusalem. There is no special difficulty in believing that a member of this party might be attracted to Jesus and become one of His chosen disciples. Galilee was the home of the party, and it naturally included in it men of very different types, from the religious fanatic to the partisan of revolution. Simon's zealotry, purified by the knowledge of Jesus, might readily become true loyalty to the Kingdom of God. Edersheim gives us the additional explanation that, at the period when the ministry of Jesus began, 'A brief calm had fallen upon the land. There was nothing to provoke active resistance, and the party of the Zealots, although existing, and striking deeper root in the hearts of the people, was, for the time, rather what Josephus called it, "the philosophical party"—their minds busy with an ideal, which their hands were not yet preparing to make a reality' (op. cit. p. 243). We should, however, take note of the alternative possibility (see Plummer, loc. cit.)

that Simon may have been called ζηλωτής 'because of his personal character either before or after his call,' as St. Paul (Gal l¹4) styles himself περισσοτέριες ζηλωτής . . . τῶν . . . παραδόσεων. See also CANANEAN.

ZEBEDEE (Ζεβεδαῖοι) is mentioned several times in the Gospels, but always as the father of James and John. Like his sons, he was a fisherman, and he and they were partners with Simon (Lk 5½). He was with James and John in a boat when they were summoned by Jesus (Mt 4²¹), and their call as disciples left him with the hired servants (Mk 1²⁰), and broke up the partnership with Simon. There is no record of any direct association of Zebedee with Jesus.

JOHN HERKLESS.

ZEBULUN. — 1. Description. — Our knowledge of the limits of Zebulun are even more indefinite than in the case of Naphtali (wh. see), and for the same reasons. It was bounded on the east by that tribe, while on the south it seems to have touched the northern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and to have included a portion of it towards the Kishon at the foot of Carmel. On the west the slopes towards the plain of Acre, and on the north the plain of Suchnin, seem to have been the boundaries. Josephus, indeed, tells us (Ant. v. i. 22) that 'the tribe of Zebulun's lot included the land that lay as far as Gennesaret, and that which belonged to Carmel and the sea.' The latter portion seems to have been implied in the promises of Gn 49<sup>12</sup> and Dt 33<sup>18</sup>, but it is excluded in Joshua's (Jos 19<sup>16-16</sup>) division of the land. The seeming contradiction may perhaps be explained by supposing that Zebulun possessed a detached portion in Haifa (AB'n), for the emphasis in the repetition of right and one of (Gn 49's) clearly assigns that port to this tribe. This would agree also with the statement of the Rabbis: 'Zebulun was going out to the seas,' 'Zebulun was diligent in business (Mrdpps), 'Zebulun was beinging in merchandise in chim' *Zebulun was bringing in merchandise in ships' (Ber. Rab. § 72, 99; Waikra Rab. § 25; Yalkut Shimeoni, § 161; Mid. Tanh.; Pesikta Zutarta and Zohar on Gn 49<sup>13</sup>). Still the main body of Zebulun touched no sea. Apart from the southwest portion in the plain of Esdraelon, the tribal lands consist of undulating hills and narrow valleys lands consist of undulating hills and narrow valleys, which, however, widen out at places into small but extremely fertile plains, the chief of which are the plain of Toran in the east, the plain of Suchnin in the north, and el-Battauf or the plain of Asochis in the centre. Zebulun is not so wild in scenery as Naphtali, nor has it the same variety of climate, being wholly situated in Lower Galilee (M. Shebiith, ix. 2). It varies in elevation from 365 feet in the plain to 1780 feet at Tell Jefāt. It possesses no perennial stream of any size, and has no lake of any kind except that from the beginning of the rainy season el-Battauf is flooded. It remains in this condition all winter, and often contains a large quantity of water till June or July. This must always have been, and still is, in itself a fruitful source of malaria, as also through the springs it feeds in the direction of Gennesaret. Elsewhere Zebulun is well supplied with springs. The rock of the district is the same soft white limestone we meet with in Naphtali. Of this there are great Toran and west of el-Battauf; but, as we have observed in Naphtali, they might easily be transformed into orchard land. The other hills, which for the most part run east and west, are covered with low prickly oak. There is nothing of the nature of forests now except in the west and southwest—beside Shefā-'Amr and el-Hāriţīye, still there is abundant evidence to show that in the 1st cent-other places, especially in the north, were well wooded (BJ III. iii. 2 and vii. 8). The chief business of the population is now and must always have been agriculture. At the present time good crops are reaped in the plains and valleys and on the hill sides. Everywhere we meet with fruits of all kinds, olive trees in the valleys, and around all the villages, orchards and vineyards, with an abundance of figs and pomegranates. On the hills, flocks of sheep and goats are pastured. But, fruitful as the land now is, it was formerly more so. We are told that in the early centuries 'the land for sixteen miles around Sepphoris flowed with milk and honey' (Jerus. Biccur. i. 8), and that means the whole tribe of Zebulun. Olive oil was plentiful around Jotapata—Tell Jefät (BJ III. vii. 28); Araba in the north was a great grain market; while Suchnin, close by, produced the best wine, and Shikmona in the south was famous for its pomegranates, just as Kefr Kenna is renowned to-day for the size and quality of those it produces. Antoninus Martyr (6th cent.) draws a most enchanting picture of the regions around Nazareth, and he compares the district to Paradise (Itiner. § 5). He was doubtless controlled to a great extent by sentiment, but it must be admitted that even at the present day many of the valleys, especially to the west of Nazareth, and above all that of Seffurich, justify his description, with their profusion of flowers, fruits, and greenness on pleasing to the eve in contrast to the white rocks.

2. People and historical associations.—As in the rest of Galilee, the Jewish population here had come in during the later days of the Maccabees and the reign of Herod. During the century preand the reign of Herod. During the century preceding our Lord's Advent, Zebulun had passed through more stirring times than any other tribe of Israel. Its chief town, Sepphoris (Dio-Cæsarea),—the traditional home of the parents of Mary,—had been repeatedly taken, and immediately after the death of Herod, when the young child Jesus was safe in Egypt, it had been twice besieged and captured, once by Judas the son of Hezekiah (BJ L. iv. 1: Ant. XVII. x. 5), and then by the troops of Varus assisted by a detachment of Arabs (BJ II. v. 1; Ant. XVII. x. 9). On the latter occasion the city was burned, and many of the inhabitants were sold into slavery. Such an event would be long impressed on the minds of the people, especially those of Nazareth, who from three miles distant would view the scene from the hill tops around their city. They would lament many a friend and brother there, and during the years to come they would be making efforts to redeem their relatives from slavery. When the boy Jesus was ten years old, the land was again to pass through the horrors of war, when Judas and his Zealots held out till overcome by Gessius Florus (Ant. XVIII. i. 6; cf. BJ II. vii. 1). Thenceforward for many years there was peace, industry, and progress. The people of Zebulun are not to be thought of as poor. We learn that the inhabitants of Sepphoris had ample means. It was one of the cities rebuilt and fortified by Herod, who made it again the capital of Galilee (Ant. XVIII. ii. 1); and amongst its inhabitants were senators and citizens (Jerus. Hornioth iii. 5). read also of a city named Zebulun in this district. read also of a city named Zebulun in this district. It is described as  $\pi \delta \lambda i_s d \pi \delta \rho \hat{\omega}_r$ , and was said to have houses like those of Tyre, Sidon, and Berytus, and to possess all sorts of good things (BJ II. xviii. 9). But whatever may have been the extent of Zebulun's trade on the sea, the people would be familiar with, and at least engage in the carrying trade on land, for the great Via Maris of ancient and modern times passes along the plains of Toran and el-Battant westward to the sea, so that, whatever Battauf westward to the sea, so that, whatever wealth the people may have become possessed of, they would at least be familiar with the sight of earth's treasures.

Not only would the memories of the events,

through which the newly settled Zebulun had passed, influence its people, but their thoughts would also be moulded by the scenes around, which were rich in old historical associations. The tribe had given two judges to Israel, Ibzan of Bethlehem (Jg 129) and Elon (1211), while 3 miles from Nazareth was Gath-hepher, the birthplace of Jonah, the first prophet to the Gentiles, and his tomb is still shown there. Then to the young Israelite of the 1st cent. no scene in the whole land could be more inspiring than the view from the hills of Zebulun. To the south the plain of Esdraelon, the battle-ground of Israel, lies stretched out—a glorious panorama. Every crisis in the nation's history had a memory there. Close at hand, by Tabor and Kishon, the men of Zebulun had 'jeoparded their lives to the death' (Jg 518). Little Hermon—the Hill of Moreh—and Gideon's fountain (71) would recall the 'day of Midian'; while Gilboa would bring thoughts of Israel's darker days, and Jezreel memories of sad declension in the time of Ahab. Shunem, Endor, and Bethshean could also be seen, and Megiddo too,—the scene of Josiah's heroic fight; while nearer still on the shoulder of Carmel was 'the place of burning,'—the site of Elijah's sacrifice, and of Baal's inglorious defeat before the God of Israel. More distant were Mt. Ebal, with its memories of blessing and cursing, and Pisgah's peak in the distant haze; while westward there would be a glimpse of the 'great sea.' All these and many more historical sites are to be seen, and thoughts of them rise and stir the heart of him who views the scene; and if so to the passing stranger, what must they have been to the young Zebulunite, whose daily food they were, and who, in virtue of His blood, was the heir of all their most glorious memories?

The relationship of this people to the Gentile world is also worthy of note. Josephus (BJ L. iv. 3) tells us of the innate enmity of the Syrian to the Jew; but here such feelings would be less intense. We are repeatedly told of bonds of union between Zebulun and Issachar, and that this latter tribe busied itself with the Torah and made many proselytes  $(Ber.\ Rab.\ \S\ 98)$ ; and before such was possible mutual jealousies must have ceased. At the same time the people would become familiar with the ceremonials of admission to Judaism, including that of baptism  $(Bab.\ Jeb.\ 46\ a,\ b)$ . It is further to be remarked that, though the text seems doubtful, the town of Nazareth in this tribe is named in the songs of Eliezer Ha-kalir as one of the meeting-places of the priests, when they assembled to go up to serve in the Temple.

of the meeting-places of the priests, when they assembled to go up to serve in the Temple.

3. Christ in Zebulun.—Although our Lord's teaching was for the most part given in the tribe of Naphtali, the land of Zebulun takes precedence not only in the prophecy (Mt 4<sup>15</sup>), but also in historical sequence, and it is equally important for a knowledge of the Gospels. If Naphtali experienced most of the brilliancy of the noonday of the Sun of Righteousness, it was in Zebulun that the dawn appeared and shone more and more unto the perfect day. In a city of this tribe the Lord Jesus was brought up (Lk 4<sup>16</sup>). As He increased in wisdom and stature, its associations aided in the moulding of His human character. During a period of well nigh 30 years His life was passed in one of its valleys, broken into only by visits to the Holy City. His earlier years were spent in the midst of its fierce politics, He knew the various party watchwords; He knew what was meant by 'wars and rumours of wars'; He had come into contact with soldiers from Tabor and Sepphoris, and early learned the terrors associated with the word 'legion'; He had met returned slaves—redeemed, freed, or fugitive; He had wrought in the villages of this tribe, and we can even think of Joseph taking the young Jesus to work with him at Sepphoris during the busy days of its rebuilding -for there was not the same objection to entering it as the polluted Tiberias. The flowers of Nazareth had fostered His love of Nature, the operations in its fields and the products of its gardens were to be used to teach lessons for eternity. Nathanael, and perhaps other disciples, were from Cana in Zebulun (Jn 212). It was in it too that Christ publicly declared His office in the gracious words He spoke (Lk 4<sup>21</sup>), that He performed His first miracle, and 'manifested forth his glory' so that 'his disciples believed on him' (Jn 2<sup>21</sup>). But when we have studied the power of all these influences, and considered to what they should lead, we only convince ourselves the more 'that what He was and what He became for the world cannot be explained or grasped by the help of contemporary history or social conditions' (Delitzsch, Handwerkleben, § 1).

As in the case of Naphtali, the Rabbis have something to say of Zebulun. They discuss the question as to what Jacob saw in vision, in that he blessed Zebulun immediately after Judah (Gn 49<sup>10-14</sup>), and the usual answer they give is that he foresaw the glories of Rabbinism in the presence of the Sanhedrin at Sepphoris before it was removed to Tiberias (Yalkut Shimeoni, i. § 161). It is, however, also recognized that 'The Holy One, blessed be He, should cause His Shekinah to dwell in Zebulun' (Shem. Rab. § 1).

APPENDIX

CHRIST IN THE EARLY CHURCH.—To treat this subject exhaustively, it would be almost necessary to write a complete history (if such a thing were possible) of the early Christian Church. Christ fills the field of vision. Christian life and Christian thought centre round His Person. It is obvious that in an article of limited length, only salient points can be touched upon, a few typical quotations given, and lines of thought suggested rather than developed.

The first Christians happily knew little of the distinction between the theological and the practical. Belief and life were one. Still, for clearness' sake, it is proposed in this article to discuss ness' sake, it is proposed in this article to discuss separately, as far as possible, (1) the beliefs of the early Church concerning the Person of Christ; (2) the feeling of the early Church as expressed in practice and devotion, with regard to the living Christ and His present relationship to mankind. The term 'early Church' is, of course, an elastic one. It can scarcely, from a theological point of view, be limited to a shorter period than that which is closed by the Sixth Ccumenical Council (A.D. 681). But within these limits a very special interest attaches to the pre-Nicene period. special interest attaches to the pre-Nicene period both from its comparative nearness to the time of Christ, and from the extreme value and interest of its records, scanty though they are. It is with this period (from the closing years of the 1st cent. to A.D. 325) that this article will chiefly deal.

i. Beliefs of the early Church as to the PERSON OF CHRIST.—1. (a) The earliest Christian writing extant outside the limits of the NT, and one which was for long on the verge of admission into the Canon, is the Epistle to the Corinthians, usually assigned to Clement, bishop of Rome. It was written probably about A.D. 95, to exhort a disordered church to unity and charity. Its interest is therefore chiefly practical, but it should be noted that at least once a doxology is addressed directly to Christ as to a Divine Person (20); that His unique dignity and pre-existence are evidently assumed in such a phrase as 'the sceptre of the majesty of God, even our Lord Jesus Christ, came not in the pomp of arrogance, or of pride, though He might have done so' (16); and that Christ is spoken of as shedding His blood for the salvation of the whole world (7).

(b) The so-called Second Epistle of Clement dates probably within the first half of the 2nd cent., and is a sermon rather than a letter, the earliest Christian sermon extant after the NT. Here Christ is definitely spoken of as 'God'(1), as pre-existent (14); and His Incarnation is described in the remarkable words, 'the Lord who saved us, being first spirit, then became flesh' (9).

(c) The seven genuine Epistles of Ignatius of Antioch are in some respects the most notable writings of the 2nd century. They were written by him while he was on his way to martyrdom at Rome, probably in the year A.D. 107, and are addressed to the Churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, dressed to the Churches of Ephesus, Magnesia, Tralles, Rome, Philadelphia, Smyrna, and to Polycarp of Smyrna. With Ignatius, Jesus Christ is 'our God' (Eph. 1. 18, and elsewhere). His blood is 'the blood of God' (ib. 1). He is 'the only Son of God' (Rom. 1); 'the unerring mouth in whom the Father hath spoken' (ib. 8). Ignatius speaks in significant language of the Incarnation, of the human life, sufferings, resurrection, and continued existence of Christ; and of His double nature; 'There is one only physician, of flesh and of spirit, born and unborn, God in man, true life in death, Son of Mary and Son of God, first passible and then impassible, Jesus Christ our Lord' ible and then impassible, Jesus Christ our Lord' (Eph. 7; cf. also ib. 18. 19. 20; Trall. 9; Smyrn. 1-3). The Virgin Birth of Christ is also distinctly alluded to in Eph. 18. 19.

(d) Another writing usually classed among the 'Apostolic Fathers,' is the so-called Epistle of Barnabas, of which the probable limits of date are between A.D. 70 and 132 (Lightfoot). The writer speaks of Christ as 'Lord of the whole world, unto whom God said from the foundation of the world, "Let us make man after our image and likeness"

(e) A mystical work which enjoyed considerable popularity in the early Church, the Shepherd, attributed in the Muratorian Canon to that Hermas who was brother of Pope Pius I. (A.D. 140-155), contains incidental statements about Christ which point generally in the same direction as those quoted above. The Son of God existed before all creation, and was God's fellow-counsellor in the work of creation (Simil. ix. 12). He supports all creation (ib. 14). At the same time the language of Hermas about the Incarnation is vague, almost as if the Son of God and the Holy Spirit were identical (Simil. v. 6). It is scarcely fair, however, to interpret this as if it were a careful theorem. logical statement. Hermas evidently was not a man of deep thought or originality. His aim is practical rather than doctrinal. Probably such expressions are to be understood in the same sense

2. A very interesting feature of the first half of the 2nd cent. is the rise of the Apologists, men of learning who had exchanged heathenism for Christianity, and who addressed heathen readers in justification or explanation of their new faith. (a) Aristides the philosopher (about A.D. 125), addressing the emperor Hadrian, speaks of Jesus Christ as 'God' who 'came down from heaven, and from a Hebrew virgin took and clad Himself with flesh; and in a daughter of man there dwelt the Son of God.

(b) Justin Martyr, in his Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, traces not only prophecies of Christ in the OT, but identifies Him with the God, or the 'angel of the LORD,' who appeared in the OT theophanies, and with the Divine Wisdom of Pr 7, etc. Justin practically anticipates the Nicene formula δμοούσιος τῷ Πατρί (128), though, as in the case of Hermas, some of his statements are vague, and, if pressed verbally, might appear inconsistent with later definitions. There can be no question, however, that he teaches the pre-existence and the Divinity of Christ, and that his writings were deeply influenced by the Logos doctrine of St. John.

(c) One of the most beautiful as well as most intellectual productions of the early Church is the anonymous Epistle to Diognetus. Here Christ is spoken of as 'the very Artificer and Creator of the Universe'; and the Father sent Him into the world, 'as sending God,' 'as a king might send his son who is a king' (7).

3. It was, however, the necessity of meeting both outside attacks on Christianity, and misconceptions of it from within, that gradually forced Christian writers to define more clearly and exactly the nature of Christ. This process of theological definition, which began towards the end of the 2nd cent., culminated in the decisions of the great Councils. Early in the 2nd cent. had begun to appear the curious half-heathen travesties of Christianity which are classed under the general name of Gnosticism. These may be described as attempts to combine Christian ideas and phrase-ology with ideas drawn from Greek and Oriental religions. The Gnostic systems really differed from Christianity on first principles, as they were generally dualistic, and assumed the essential evil of matter. They denied in consequence the perfect humanity of Christ (a tendency alluded to in the later writings of the NT; cf. 1 Jn 421), and the true union of human nature with the Divine nature in one Person. The Gnostic Christ was not really born of Mary, nor did He truly suffer.

(a) The first and chief opponent of Gnosticism, one of the most extensive writers of the early Church, was Irenaus, bishop of Lyons from 177-202 (?). He meets the Gnostic systems by stating what was definitely believed about Christ in the Christian Church, which is the repository of truth, —truth inherited from the Apostles, preserved by the Church, and the same in all parts of the Church (i. 10, iii. 1, 4, 24). Irenæus states this faith of the Church in language very similar to that of the later Creeds. The Church, he says, believes in one Christ Jesus, the Son of God, who became incarnate for our salvation; . . . and the ascension into heaven in the flesh of the beloved Christ Jesus, our Lord, and His future manifestation from heaven in the glory of the Father to gather all things in one, and to raise up anew all flesh of the whole human race, in order that to Christ Jesus, our Lord and God and Saviour and King, every knee should bow, etc. (i. 10). Irenæus clearly teaches the pre-existence of Christ, that He was begotten and not created (iii. 18); that His humanity is perfect, sinless, yet absolutely real and not Docetic (ib.); and that He is God and man in one Person (iii. 16). Perhaps the most remark-able contribution of Irenæus to Christology is his teaching that all mankind is gathered together and summed up in the Incarnation ('in seipso recapitulavit,' iii. 18, etc.).

(b) In the East, Gnosticism was met by the

and Origen, who further developed the conception of Christ as the Logos who is immanent in the Universe. Origen was in some respects a thinker in advance of his age, and his teaching was undoubtedly misunderstood by his successors. Whether his doctrine of Christ was altogether in harmony with the later definitions of the Councils has often been questioned. That it was really so has been maintained strongly by Bishop Bull in his Defence of the Nicene Creed, and by Bishop Westcott. Origen certainly taught the eternal generation of the Son of God (de Princ. i. 2), which doctrine supplies the basis of the reply to the Arian quibbles about the posteriority of the Son to the Father; the reality of the Incarnation (de Princ. ii. 6); and he spoke of Christ as the God-man (θεάνθρωπος).

4. The 3rd cent is marked by a series of heresies which from different points of view attacked the doctrine which, as we have seen, had been consistently held in the Church, though at times vaguely stated, of the unique relationship of the Son to the Father, in other words, of the Divinity of the historic Christ. How, it was asked, could the Divinity and the eternal pre-existence of Christ be reconciled with the unity of God? There were two principal heretical answers to this problem, and they may be called 'heretical' in a sense that Gnosticism was not, because they arose within the Church itself, and claimed to be the original doctrine.

(a) The Adoptianists, who seem to have been the doctrinal successors of the early Judaic-Christian sect of the Ebionites, and whose chief teachers at Rome were Theodotus and Artemon, all taught a subordination, to a greater or less degree, of the Son to the Father, even making Christ nothing more than a highly exalted man, who was 'adopted' to His Sonship by the Father. This last point was reached by the teaching of the brilliant Paul of Samosata (280-270), who was condemned by a series of Councils at Antioch, and finally deposed in 270.

(b) On the other hand, the Monarchians or Patripassians, represented by Praxeas, Noetus, and Sabellius, so merged the personality of the Son and the Holy Spirit in the unity of the Father, that it practically followed from their teaching that the historic Christ was actually the Father Himself who was incarnate, and suffered on the cross, so that, in the spiteful epigram of Tertullian, Praxeas 'put to flight the Comforter and crucified the Father.'

The most important opponents of these heresies were Hippolytus, bishop of Portus (d. 2587), and Dionyslus, bishop of Rome (d. 269). Only a fragment remains of the writings of the latter; and those of the former, as well as the exact nature of his teaching, are wrapped in considerable obscurity.

The controversies of the 3rd cent. obviously still waited for a final solution. It is quite evident that the general conscience of the Church revolted against both Adoptianism and Patripassianism, though the uncertainty of theological terms, the absence of a fixed theological vocabulary, and the difficulty of arriving at common action owing to the stress of frequent persecutions, rendered it difficult for the Church as a whole to come to close quarters with these different forms of error. slight sketch of pre-Nicene theology should, however, be sufficient to show that, despite the absence of any statement of faith common to the whole Church, there is an overwhelming consensus of Church belief from the first to the effect (1) that the historic Jesus Christ was truly God, preexistent with the Father; (2) that He was also truly man; (3) that in Him are permanently united God and man in one Person.

5. The Edict of Milan (312) introduces a new era of Church history. Persecution ceased, Christianity tended at once to become the recognized religion of the Empire. This sudden outburst of popularity brought into the Church an influx of ill-instructed converts, who were naturally eager to assimilate Christianity as far as possible to their old heathenism.

(a) The teaching of Arius, a parish priest of Alexandria, who had, however, previously studied at Antioch, brought swiftly the crisis when the Church must definitely and clearly state her belief as to the Person of Christ. We thus enter upon the era of the great Councils, called 'Œcumenical,' as involving an appeal to the universal conscience and witness of the Christian Church throughout Arius seems to have taught a form of Adoptianism: Christ was the Son of God, and prior to all other created things, and yet Himself a creature. To pay Divine honours to a creature, however exalted, was, of course, really idolatry; but for this very reason Arianism was popular with those nominal converts who had never in their heart relinquished their old polytheism. To the teaching of Arius, the Church at the Council of Nicæa (325), mainly through the exertions of the great Athanasius, opposed the keyword of the Nicene Creed. Christ, the Son of God, is 'of one substance' (ὁμοούσιος) with the Eather is He is and was from all eternity of the Father, i.e. He is, and was from all eternity, of the same Godhead as the Father. Strife and controwersy raged round this celebrated phrase during most of the 4th century. It was defended con-sistently by Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregorys (of Nyssa and Nazianzus). Ultimately all attempts to substitute for it some vaguer expression failed, and the Council of Constantinople (381) definitely re-affirmed the Nicene statement. The absolute Deity of Christ in the fullest sense of the term was thus finally vindicated. Other problems, however, remained.

(b) Apollinarism, a reaction against Arianism, ascribed to Christ an imperfect human nature, in which the Divine nature took the place of the human 'spirit' (*ree@a), the highest part of man's rational nature. This error was condemned at Constantinople (381); and it seems that at some later date other clauses were added to the original Nicene Creed, derived apparently from a Jerusalem baptismal creed, which emphasized the true and perfect humanity of Christ.

(c) The Council of Ephesus (431) dealt with a further problem, the 'Hypostatic Union,' i.e. the union of two whole and perfect natures, Divine and human, in the one Person of Christ. (a) The teaching of Nestorius, in which there are distinct traces of Gnosticism, practically made two persons of Christ, by denying that the infant child of Mary could properly be called 'God'; and by asserting apparently that at some time after the birth of Jesus, the Divine Logos united Itself with Him. The key-word which the Church adopted to refute Nestorius was the title Theotokos, 'mother of God,' applied to the Virgin Mary. (3) A reaction in an opposite direction led Eutyches a few years later to exalt the Divinity of Christ at the expense of His humanity, by teaching that the humanity was in some way swallowed up in the Divinity. The famous 'Tome' of Pope Leo I. stated the balance of faith clearly and antithetically and the company of the cally, and the fourth Council (Chalcedon, 451), in condemning Eutyches, laid down that the two natures of Christ are to be acknowledged ἀσυγχύτως ('without confusion'), 4τρέπτως ('without change'), άδιαιρέτως ('without division'), άχωρίστως ('without separation'). The same truths were stated in a Latin dress, for liturgic use, about this time, in the so-called 'Athanasian' Creed.

(d) Eutychianism, however, with its disproportionate reverence for the Divinity of Christ, proved too fascinating for the Eastern mind to be disposed of by the Council of Chalcedon. Political as well as religious causes entered into the long 'Monophysite' controversy. The fifth Œcumenical Council (Constantinople, 553) again condenned those who were unwilling to admit the full and perfect humanity existing in the one Person of Christ. The sixth Council (Constantinople, 681) marks the last phase of the long debate. Monothelitism, the last stronghold of Monophysitism, was overthrown by the statement of two wills in Christ, human and Divine, the former perfectly subject to the latter.

The steps by which the halting theology of the pre-Nicene period led finally to the full statement of the Catholic faith, were a legitimate and, indeed, a necessary development. It is not one of the least evidences to a Divine power working in the Christian Church, that, in an age of cosmopolitan super-stition and intellectual unrest, all attempts to assimilate Christianity to heathenism were re-jected, and a clearly defined and balanced statement of truth emerged and gained almost entire possession of the field. With all its mystery, the Catholic faith of Nicæa and Chalcedon was felt by the common Christian conscience alone to satisfy all the different sides of truth as they are contained in Scripture, and to do justice to all that Christians from the first had believed concerning their Master. To-day there is practically no alternative left between the Nicene Creed and humanitarianism. the latter is true, the appearance of Christ and its subsequent effect on the world must remain an insoluble enigma,—a miracle even more difficult of credence than the stupendous statement of the Nicene formula.

ii. Devotion of the early Church to Christ. —Whatever uncertainties or faulty definitions may be detected in the statements of pre Nicene theology, there is no uncertainty as to the attitude of the early Church towards the personal Christ. Lex supplicandi, lex credendi. In the devotion which made men and women and little children live and die for Christ, we shall find even a surer guide than in the attempts of Christian writers to explain their belief. From the very first Jesus Christ stands out in all the records of the early Church as the personal, living Master, not merely the Shepherd and High Priest of His faithful ones, but the true Lord and King of the Universe. He is the object of passionate love, obedience, prayer, and worship.1. (a) To Clement of Rome, Christ is 'the high priest of our offerings, the guardian and helper of our weakness' (36). Through Him the Father our weakness' (36). Through Him the Fat 'instructed us, sanctified us, honoured us' (59).

(b) The unknown author of the Second Epistle of Clement opens his sermon with a burst of enthusiastic gratitude: 'What recompense then shall we give to Him (Jesus Christ)? or what fruit worthy of His own gift to us? And how many mercies do we owe Him! For He bestowed the light on us. He works to us a father to his the light on us; He spake to us, as a father to his sons; He saved us when we were perishing He called us when we were not, and from not being He willed us to be.'

(c) The epigrammatic sentences of Ignatius glow with passionate love to Christ. 'Jesus Christ' is 'our inseparable life' (Eph. 3); true Christians are arrayed from head to foot in the commandments of Jesus Christ' (ib. 9); faith and love in Jesus Christ are 'the beginning and the end of life' (ib. 14). 'He that possesseth the word of Jesus is able to hearken to His silence' (ib. 15),—a remarkable and pregnant phrase. Ignatius desires suffering and martyrdom that he 'may attain Christ,' and 'rise free in Him' (Rom. 4. 5. 6). The blood of Jesus Christ is 'eternal and abiding joy' (Phil. 1).

Those who 'speak not concerning Jesus Christ' he looks on as 'tombstones and graves of the dead, on which are inscribed only the names of men'

(d) The Epistle to Diognetus speaks of 'the Word, who was from the beginning, who appeared as new and yet was proved to be old, and is engendered always young in the hearts of saints,— through whom the Church is enriched and grace is unfolded and multiplied among the saints, grace which confers understanding and reveals mysteries'

(6) Justin Martyr describes how, after searching vainly for truth and satisfaction among the Stoics, the Peripatetics, the Pythagoreans, and the Platonists, he at last was led by the advice of a certain aged man whom he met on the seashore to study the Scriptures, and to conceive a love of Christ. 'Straightway,' he says, 'a flame was kindled in my soul' (Trypho, 8).

2. Not only was Christ loved, He was also obeyed.

His commandment must take precedence of every other claim. To Hermas, divorce and remarriage after divorce are as absolutely forbidden as unchastity (Command. iv. 1). Justin Martyr similarly regards as absolute the teaching of Christ respecting divorce, forgiveness, charity, endurance of injuries, swearing, and civil obedience (1 Apol.

3. That the personal Christ was worshipped by the early Church as Lord and God is indisputable. Prayer and thanksgiving were addressed directly to Him.

(a) The famous letter of Pliny to Trajan (A.D. 113?) speaks of having elicited from Christians, who had been examined, that it was their custom on a fixed day to assemble before daylight and sing alternately 'a hymn to Christ as God.'

(b) A remarkable hymn attributed to cleanly of Alexandria, intended apparently to be sung by Christian children, in which Christ is addressed throughout and praised as Ruler, Shepherd, and in his Pardagogus (iii. 12). Of a slightly later date are such hymns as the Gloria in excelsis and the Hail gladdening Light. Indeed, it seemed to the Church, when confronted by the Arian problem, one of the most convincing proofs of the error of the teaching of Arius, that Christ had always received Divine honours in the Church.

(c) The personal nearness of Christ to the believer during Christian worship was especially associated with the Eucharist. To Ignatius, 'the Eucharist is the flesh of Jesus Christ,' though the false teachers deny it (Smyr. 6). 'There is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one cup unto union with His blood' (Phil. 4). To Justin Martyr, the Eucharist, the conditions of receiving which are belief, baptism, and a life according to the com-mandments of Christ, is not common bread and common drink, but the flesh and blood of the in-carnate Jesus, by which our blood and flesh are nourished (1 Apol. 66). To Irenæus and the Christian Fathers generally, participation in the Eucharist is the actual means whereby Christians share in the life and resurrection of Christ.

share in the life and resurrection of Unrist.

(d) The testimonies of the Christian martyrs are most suggestive. Ignatius, brought before the emperor Trajan, calls himself Theophorus, 'Bearer of God,' saying that he bears the Crucified within his breast. Polycarp of Smyrna, when called upon by the pro-consul to revile Christ, confessed in memorable words, 'Fourscore and six years have I served Him and He bath done me no wrong. I served Him, and He hath done me no wrong. How then can I blaspheme my King and Saviour! And the apparently contemporary record of the martyrdom of Polycarp closes with the significant words: 'The blessed Polycarp was apprehended words: 'Ine blessed Polycarp was apprehended by Herodes, when Philip of Tralles was high priest, in the proconsulship of Statius Quadratus, but in the reign of the Eternal King, Jesus Christ.' The martyrs of Lyons and Vienne (177) are spoken of in the contemporary letter which describes their sufferings (Eus. Hist. Eccl. v. 1) as 'hastening to Christ'; 'through them Christ showed that things which sprear mean and obscure and contemptible which appear mean and obscure and contemptible to men are with God of great glory.' One of them, St. Blandina, 'was clothed with Christ, the mighty and conquering Athlete.' Their patience manifested 'the measureless mercy of Christ.' And with one and all who suffered, the simple confession of the name of Christ seems to have been the strength which sustained them. St. Perpetua, the African martyr (early in the 3rd cent.), was comforted before her sufferings by a vision of Christ as an aged man, a shepherd, sitting in the midst of a spacious garden, who said to her, 'Thou hast done well, my child, in coming.' St. Maximus, who suffered under Decius, declared, 'These are not torments, but anointings which are laid upon us for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ's (Ruinart, Acta Martyrum, p. 204). Phileas of Thmus, put to death in Diocletian's persecution, said in his last words: 'Now we begin to be disciples of our Lord Jesus Christ. Beloved, attend to the commandments of the Lord.—Let us call upon Him, the spotless, the infinite One, who sitteth upon the Cherubim, the Maker of all things, who is the Beginning and the End, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen' (ib. p. 521).

4. Interesting light on early Christian feeling is thrown by the funeral inscriptions and symbols of the Catacombs. As a rule, the inscriptions are of extreme brevity. Their leading thought is that dead Christians are with Christ in a continued existence of peace and joy. The aspirations and prayers of their friends on earth go with them, and the departed in turn remember the living in prayer to Christ, e.g. 'Vivas'; 'Vivas in Deo Christo'; 'In pace'; 'Deus refrigeret spiritum tuum'; 'Quam stabile tibi hæc vita est' (i.e. the life beyond the grave); 'Spiritus tuus in pace et in Christo'; μνήσκεσθε δὲ καὶ ἡμῶν ἐν ταῖς ἀγίαςς 'Ψῶν παῖς το Καρίνου (καρίνου).

5. Most of the early Christian pictures of Christ are merely symbolical, the Lamb and the Fish being the most common. But the earliest personal representation is suggestive; it is the figure of the Good Shepherd, sometimes bearing the lost sheep on His shoulders, sometimes surrounded by His flock. This tender personal relationship between the soul and the Saviour, or between the Church and her Lord, which stands in such striking contrast to the trials and sufferings that surrounded the daily life of the Christian in a hostile world, was evidently the aspect which appealed most deeply to the heart of the early believer.

6. The relation of Christ both to His Church and to the world was also set forth impressively in the so-called 'majesties,' with which from the 4th cent. onwards the Christian art began to adorn the churches. In these pictures Christ is represented as reigning now in glory, bearing the symbols of His royal, prophetic, and priestly offices. It was not merely to an historic Christ that Christians looked back, or a future coming to judgment that they anticipated, though both these conceptions were vividly present in the mind of the early Church. It was a Christ actually in possession of His Kingdom, even now ruling over the nations, and surrounded by His worshipping saints (who even in this present time shared His throne), that dominated the thought of the early centuries. So in the great mosaics in the Church of St. Cosmas and St. Damian at Rome (6th cent.), the colossal figure of Christ stands in the apse, fronting the worshippers, portrayed on a dark-blue ground amid golden-edged clouds of sunset; His right hand is raised in blessing, His left holds a written scroll. The figures of St. Peter and St. Paul, with palm-trees of Paradise and the phenix (the emblem of the Resurrection), stand on each side of the Christ, and beneath His feet flows the river Jordan. Below this again is the representation of the Lamb, with the four rivers of Paradise and twelve sheep on either side.

The representations of the suffering and dying Christ, which became the favourites of a later age, have, of course, an independent value. Nevertheless there is a peculiar beauty and significance in the mingled majesty and tenderness of those earlier pictures of the living Christ, which expressed the love of those whose faith in Him had literally overcome the world. See Christ in

ART.

7. The two strands of theology and devotion which we have endeavoured to trace in the early Church seem fittingly to meet in the most remarkable man after St. Paul whom the Church has seen, the great Athanasius. It was largely due, as we have seen, to him that the traditional belief of the Church, at the greatest crisis of Church history, took its clear and definite and accurately reasoned shape in the Catholic creeds. And it is defence of the Homoousion was seen by his con-temporaries to lie in his own personal devotion from childhood onwards to the Person of the Redeemer. 'Athanase était enflammé, dès sa jeunesse, de la passion qui fait les saints, l'amour de Jésus Christ' (De Broglie, L'Eglise et l'Empire, i. 372). 'His maintenance of dogma was a lifelong act of devotion' (Bright, Church Hist. p. 149). The great treatise On the Incarnation of the Word, which marks an epoch in theological writings, is no mere dogmatic statement, but glows with the pure passion of belief. It is the work of one who profoundly and from the heart believes in Christ as a living Person, in His present power, and His absolute claim upon mankind. The power of the Cross of Christ and His Resurrection from the dead are to Athanasius the greatest of facts, unparalleled in history, illimitable in their future consequences. 'The achievements of the Saviour,' he says, 'resulting from His becoming man, are of such a kind and number that if one should wish to enumerate them, he may be compared to men who gaze at the expanse of the sea and wish to count its waves . . .; to sum the matter up, behold how the Saviour's doctrine is everywhere increasing, while all idolatry and everything opposed to the faith of Christ is daily dwindling and losing power and falling; and thus beholding, worship the Saviour, who is above all and mighty, even God the Word' (54, 55).

8. Not only on the highways of Church history does the figure of the living Christ stand out as the central object of Christian love and loyalty. Such a wonderful production as the Hymn of St. Patrick, with a quotation from which we will close this brief survey, illustrates the impression which the preaching of Christ produced upon the infant nations just emerging from barbarism. It belongs to the 5th or 6th cent., a time when the civilization and empire of Rome were failing, and men were clinging to Christ as the one power which could guide and set free their lives:

'Christ with me, Christ before me, Christ behind me, Christ within me, Christ beneath me, Christ above me, Christ on my right, Christ on my left, Christ in the fort. Christ in the chariot-seat, Christ on the poop. Christ in the heart of every man who thinks of me, Christ in the mouth of every man who speaks to me, Christ in every eye that sees me, Christ in every ear that hears me.'

Christ in every ear that hears me.'

CHRIST IN THE MIDDLE AGES.—The Christ-

CHRIST IN THE MIDDLE AGES .- The Christology of the Middle Ages was, of course, the out-growth of that of the earlier time, and each medieval type can readily be traced to its source. The main lines of influence are: that of Augustine, working directly through the continued use of his writings, and indirectly through the personality and writings of Gregory the Great, Anselm of Canterbury, Bernard of Clairvaux, Abelard, Peter Lombard, Thomas Aquinas, etc.; that of the Neo-Platonic pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, working directly through the continued use of his writings, and indirectly through the propagation of his modes of thought by Maximus the Confessor, Scotus Erigena, the German Mystics, etc.; Adoptianism, which gena, the German Mystics, etc.; Adoptianism, which flourished in the immediately post-Apostolic (if not in the Apostolic) times, was vigorously propagated in Armenia, and perpetuated there by the Paulicians even down to the present time, had a vigorous development in Spain during the 8th and 9th cents. and affected much of the dissenting evangelical thought of the mediæval time; and the Gnostic-Manichean modes of thought, perpetuated from the early time, and reappearing in the Catharistic sects. For the Greek Church the Christology of John of Damascus, who in the 8th cent. reduced to system the net results of the Christological controversies of the three preceding centuries, continued to be normative during the Middle Ages, and little independent theorizing seems to have found place.

1. Beyond almost any other Christian thinker, Augustine magnified Christ. This name, drunk in piously and deeply, even with his mother's milk (Conf. iii. 8), never lost its power over him even during his years of wandering. Having become emancipated from Manichean dualism through the study of Neo-Platonic writings (Plotinus, Amelius, et al.) he found himself unable with satisfaction to fix his gaze upon the glories of the invisible and unchangeable God until he had embraced that 'Mediator between God and man, himself man, Christ Jesus,' 'who is over all, God blessed for ever,' 'the way, the truth, and the life.' Yet he did not at once grasp the mystery of the Incarnation, and he failed for a time to attain to anything higher than Adoptianism. He thought of Christ 'as of a man of excellent wisdom,' virginborn and surpassing other men, an example to us of 'contemning temporal things for the obtaining of immortality.' Fully assured of the unchangeableness of the Divine Word, he was unable to believe that He ate, drank, slept, walked, rejoiced, was sad, and discoursed; and so felt compelled (against Arians and Apollinarians) to insist upon a complete humanity in Christ to which such actions and experiences would be appropriate (Conf. vii. 24, 25). Though strongly influenced by Neo-Platonism, which generally made for Monophysitism, Augustine was a Dyophysite of the most pronounced type. Yet one would search in vain in his writings for any accurate definition of the relations of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ, or of the manner in which the Divine Logos and the man Jesus were united in a single personality. He guarded carefully against any admission of a blending of Deity and humanity, as well as against the supposition that Christ's humanity is converted into Deity. He calls the humanity of Christ 'garment,' 'temple,' 'vehicle,' 'instrument.' By virtue of its association with Deity, the soul of Christ possessed perfect knowledge from the very beginning; and His disclaiming of knowledge about this or that was for the sake of His disciples. Yet Augustine denied freedom of choice to the humanity of Christ, which he made subject to predestination. He regarded the Incarnation of the Logos as necessary in order that our souls might become His members, and that the devil might be vanquished by the same nature that he had seduced. The Incarnation was the work of the entire Trinity, and the Word stood in no nearer relation to the Son than did the entire Trinity (cf. Harnack, Dogmengesch. iii. 116 [Eng. tr. v. 226]). The following sentence is highly significant:

'God assumed (suscepti) our nature, i.e. the rational soul and flesh of the man Christ, by an assumption singularly wonderful and wonderfully singular, that, no merits of his own righteousness having preceded, he should thus become Son of God from the beginning in which he began to be man, that he himself (the man Christ) and the Word might be one person' (de Correptione et Gratia, 30).

Augustine seems never to have reached a thoroughly wrought-out and self-consistent Christology. He was uncertain whether the Incarnation was necessary to man's redemption, conceiving it possible that God might have chosen another way. The body of Christ he regarded as a part of the Adamic mass, which was constituted a body by the act of assumption, conceived by Mary not by carnal concupiscence, but by spiritual faith (Dorner, Pcrs. of Christ, II. i. 398). By the Incarnation our souls become Christ's members, and the devil is vanquished by the same nature that he seduced. As in accordance with the Divine plan of redemption Christ must needs purchase sin-cursed men with His own death, He assumed a human body with all human affections and infirmities, including mortality, yet without concupiscence. In assuming human nature He cleansed it. 'He became man in order that He might make us gods.' Yet He did not renounce the 'form of God,' but continued with the Father in heaven, while Jesus was sojourning upon earth. His emptying was merely an occultation. Like St. Paul, Augustine laid the utmost stress on the humiliation involved in the Incarnation, the human life, and the obedience even unto death; and yet he insisted that the Divine nature as being absolutely immutable could only join sympathetically with the human in psychical and physical suffering. The atoning work of Christ he thought of as redemption from the power of the devil—who had taken up his abode in human souls deserted by God because of sin, and who was conceived of as having a sort of vested right in them—quite as much as reconciliation to God. By receiving the penalty of sin, and not taking upon Himself the fault (culpa), He blotted out both penalty and fault for us. Christ's death possessed atoning power because of His virgin birth, spotless righteousness, and voluntary obedience to God. The temporal death of Christ frees believers from eternal death.

Side by side with Augustine's magnifying of Christ went his disposition to exalt the Church and its sacraments. He supposed that the benefits wrought for man through the Incarnation and sufferings of Christ become available for man only through the medium of the sacraments of which the Church is the sole dispenser.

2. Gregory the Great was not an original thinker on Christological questions. He went far beyond Augustine in his ecclesiasticism and sacramentalism, and while professing to be a devout follower of Augustine, greatly enervated his doctrines in reproducing them. In his teaching regarding the atoning work of Christ he laid more stress than did Augustine on the rightful power of the devil over mankind, and the ransom paid him by Christ in His death. The God-man, virgin-born and without concupiscence, he regarded as both a mediator between God and man, and an example for us. The atoning work of Christ does not avail for human salvation unless man fills up by a life of humility and suffering that which remained of the sufferings of Christ. 'He who strives to be redeemed and to rule with Him must be crucified.'

'Without intermission the Redeemer offers up a burnt-offering for us, in that without ceasing He shows to the Father His incarnation on our behalf; since His incarnation is an oblation for our cleansing: and when He showed Himself as man, by intervening, He washed away the faults of man. And by the mystery of His humanity He perennially offers sacrifice, because these faults also which He cleanses away are eternal' (Moral, 1941)

He laid much stress upon the constant intercession of Christ; but this was supposed to be mediated by angels, saints, alms, masses, and by other forms of meritorious works. In fact, he was so overmastered by the efficacy of sacramental forms and the continuous sacrifice, that he regarded the death of Christ as not absolutely necessary for man's redemption. God who created us might have delivered us from the consequences of sin without the death of Christ. He thought of the death of Christ as an exhibition of the Divine love, and as an example wherewith to teach us not to fear the misfortunes and sufferings of this world, but rather to avoid earthly good fortune. His sacrificial view of the Lord's Supper, with its sacerdotal accompaniments, greatly enervated his conception of the Person of Christ and its historical significance. In this rite the suffering of Christ is repeated continuously for our reconciliation, 'the whole Christ being in each portion' of the consecrated elements. In the words of Harnack:

'Christ as a person is forgotten. He is a great title in dogmatics...; but the fundamental questions of salvation are not answered in relation to him, and in life the baptized person has to avail himself of "means" which exist partly side by side with him (Christ), partly without him, or only bear his badge' (Dogmengesch. iii. 241 f. [Eng. tr. v. 271]).

Fear and hope take the place of faith and love; fear of punishment takes the place of repentance for sin. Thus the mediaval type of ascetical piety was fully established (of Harnek 1c.)

was fully established (cf. Harnack, l.c.).

3. A vigorously led Adoptianist movement in Spain during the later years of the 8th century, probably influenced by Saracen thought, led Alcuin, supported by Charlemagne and the Council of Frankfurt (794), to set forth as the Christological teaching of the Frankish Church, in opposition to the Nestorian doctrine, alleged to be involved in the Adoptianism of bishops Elipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel, a doctrine scarcely distinguishable from Eutychianism. Alcuin insisted that Christ is not 'man,' but the 'God-man'; that He is not 'in everything like us apart from sin,' but 'in many things.' He taught that in the union of the Divine and the human the human personality was blotted out (deleri) or consumed (consumi) by the Divine, and that the Divine personality took the place of the destroyed human personality. 'In the assumption of flesh by God the person of man perished, not the nature' (adv. Felicem, 2. 12). Thus Adoptianism provoked a reaction in the Western Church against an extreme as well as against the natural and proper interpretation of the Chalcadonian Symbol; and while it did not lead to the general acceptance of pure Eutychianism, it came perilously near eliminating from Western Christology the conception of the real and complete humanity of Christ

It has been pointed out by Dorner, with admirable insight (II. i. 270 ff.), that while Christ continued to be regarded by the Greek Church as the revealed wisdom of God, and stress was laid upon His prophetic office employed in the diffusion of enlightenment as embodied in the 'orthodox faith,' in the Latin Church He was regarded during the medizival time as first and foremost a King, Christianity was regarded as a means of securing power, and the hierarchy was supposed to have been appointed by Christ to occupy His place, rale in His stead, virtually to supersede Him in personal povernment, and to abolish any direct intercourse between Him and believers. No longer was personal fellowship of the believer with Christ thought of as the supreme good or even as a possibility. Having founded the Church and endowed it with plenary powers, Christ was no longer needed as a personal and highly sympathetic appearated. If a personal and highly sympathetic appearated was desiderated, this was to be found in the Virgin Mary, who had already been exalted to almost Divine proportions. The Church came to be regarded as the present living incarnation of Christ.

4. Next to that of Augustine, the most potent influence on medieval Christology in the West was that of the unknown writer (probably active during the later years of the 6th cent.) whose Reclasionstical Hierarchy, Henrendy Hierarchy, Divine

6. Next to that of Augustine, the most potent influence on medieval Christology in the West was that of the unknown writer (probably active during the later years of the 6th cent.) whose Ecclesiantscal Hierarchy, Housenly Hierarchy, Divine Names, and Mystical Theology were credited to Dionystus the Arespegtia, converted by St. Paul on the occasion of his visit to Athena. The writer was thoroughly imbued with the Neo-Platonic thought of Plotinus, Proclus, Jamblicus, etc., and wrought out a magnificent and highly impressive scheme of Christian theosophy on a Neo-Platonic basis. The credit of these works was greatly enhanced by the supposition that they constituted the sectoric teachings of the Aposte Paul, which were too spiritual and szalted for the people of his time. In The Divine Names (ii. 10)

time. In The Darme Names (ii. 10).

'The flue is all in all and the hand of all things . . . , for He is the release and cobselveness of all things, and He element and firmly blade the parts by the wholesees, and He is neither part nor whole for He is above them, but both part and whole so having subtread all things, for He is emitted above matters, and is antecedent to causation, and He is the perfect among us superperfect and anterperfect, and having no point of compartion with them as regards perfection, and He is the formality of all form, and without form on the creater and originative of all form, and without form with respect to things that have received form as bulng above form.

Much more is said by way of emphasizing the absolute transcendence and the relative immanence

This view of Christ and the world would seem to preclude belief in a specific Incarnation; but the devotion of pseudo-Dionysius to the creed of the Church and his sense of the reality of historical Christianity held him back in some measure from sheer Docetism. He maintained, therefore, that the Deity of Jesus in its exceeding goodness came even to our nature and truly assumed the substance of our flesh, so that the Most High God could be called man, the super-essential essence thus shining forth out of humanity. He communicated Himself to us without mixture or change, suffering no harm from His unspeakable humiliation. He was supernatural in our natural, super-essential in what belongs to our essence, and He possessed in a unique manner all that is ours, of us, and above us. True to his pantheistic conception that God can be named with the names of all His creatures, pseudo-Dionysius asserts that He who is the author of man was truly man as to His entire nature. Yet He was not merely man, and not morely superemential in relation to man; but He is actually man above men and according to men, or, in other words, He is the archetypal man of whom all individual men are the unreal copies. In a superhuman manner He performed human acts. He was a man humanly born, but man above man; and inasmuch as in Him God had become man, He developed a Divine-human energy (Ep. ad Caissa, iv.). The pseudo-Dionysius found it practically impossible to find any place in the Universe for the God-man Jesus Christ, thus vaguely and Docetically conceived (Dorner). To assign Him a place in the sarthly sphere would be degrading; to place Him in the heavenly order would involve Docetien. Without being quite willing to do so, he virtually relinquished the historical Christ, retaining only the sternal. These writings figured largely in the Christological controversies in the East during the 7th and 8th centuries.

5. Maximus the Confessor (d. 662), though a staunch advocate of Dyothelitism, taught a form of mysticism derived largely from the pseudo-Dionysius. Banished by the Eastern Emperor because of his uncompromising opposition to Monothelitism, he made Carthage the seems of his later activities, and from this vantage ground diffused throughout the Western Church the pseudo-Dionysian mysticism. He regarded the pseudo-Dionysian as the holy revealer of Divine mysteries, as the 'all-holy,' the 'great asint,' the 'God-revealer,' and he had no doubt as to his identity with 8t. Paul's Athenian convert. Almost equally with the Arcopagite, Maximus falls into pantheistic and Docetic conceptions.

The fulness of the Ordhead which was in Christ by metury is in Christians by grace, as far as their nature is capable of reacting it. Has on account of his love to God becomes Gol for God, on account of his love to sank he becomes meal for man. Christ is continually and of life own will mystically born, for Ho is made first in and through the reductmed. The Legui hecease the fluo of Has in order think He might make men gods and some of God.

The Incarnation can hardly be said to have been regarded by Maximus as more than a theophany, and it was by no means limited to Jesus. If the latter participates in the Divine more fully than other men, it is only because His natura laid hold of it more fully (cf. Dorner, II. i. 228 ff.). The heterogeneous mixture of pseudo-Dionysian Nes-Platonic mysticism and mystagogy with Dyothelitium in Maximus opened wide the door in the West as well as in the East for the influence of the former.

6. That the influence of the Arsopagite and of Maximus was brought mightily to hear upon the orthodoxy of the East is manifest in the Fountain of Knowledge of John of Damaseus (d. about 764), who yet uncompromisingly maintained the persistence of two wills in the Person of Christ (Christ unitedly willing in correspondence with each of the two natures), and the freedom of His human will. The pseudo-Dionysian formula, 'Divine-human energy,' he understood to imply a Divine and a human activity each permanently differentiated from the other; yet he was at great pains to show the unity of the two natures (cf. Dorner, H. i. 210). The permention of the human mature by the Divine involved in his conception the deification of the human. He illustrates the relation of the Divine and the human in Christ by the permention of iron by heat. The human intellect of Christ, by virtue of this permention, participated in the all-comprehending Divine knowledge from the beginning. He takes a Docetic view of the NT representation he regards Docetically the prayers of Christ. God constituting the pursuality in Christ, there was no occasion for prayer except to furnish an example to us and to do honour to God. Yet he was very far from accepting the Eutychian idea that Divine attributes were communicated to the human nature. While the flesh became the flesh of the Word, and the soul of Jesus the soul of the Word, the human nature remained unaltered in essence. Solely on the ground of the fellowship of the Divine and the human was the flesh of the Lord enriched by the Divine activities. It is evident that this great thinker, whose Fountain of Knowledge is still normative in the Greek Church, failed to gain a perfectly consistent view of the relations of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ.

7. The views of the pseudo-Dionysius and Maximus reappeared among the monks of Mount Athos about the middle of the 14th cent. (Hesychasts, Quietists), and occasioned the Hesychastic controversy, the chief opponents being the leaders of the party that was promoting union with the Latin Church. The cause of the Hesychasts was ably defended by Nicolaus Cabasilas, bishop of Thessalonica, and by Marcus Eugenicus, archbishop of Ephesus. The Christology of Cabasilas is highly transcendental. He regarded Christ as the resting-place of those human yearnings that are directed towards the highest good, as the luxuriant pasture of the thoughts, as the eternal good incorporated with time. Although he held fast to the Chalcedonian doctrine of two natures and two wills, he yet regarded the Word as super-essential even in the Incarnation, and the humanity of Christ as superhuman and deified though of like substance with us. The sacraments of the Church he regarded as the channels through which life streams forth from Christ to us. Baptism represents the generation in us of the new Christlife. Everything pertaining to man's salvation was accomplished by the death and resurrection of Christ. Baptism simply transfers the saving efficacy to the individual. The purification of human nature accomplished in the Incarnation in Christ is accomplished in the individual Christian by his partaking of the Divine-human nature present in the Eucharist. Appropriating Christ in this feast, we enter into a blood-relationship with God and Christ; and as Christ's humanity became deified in the Incarnation, so do believers by partaking of Him.

8. In the West, John Scotus Erigena (d. about 880) translated, under the patronage of Charles the Bald, the pseudo-Dionysian writings, by which, as well as by the writings of Maximus, he had been profoundly influenced. Through him the Neo-Platonic mysticism was transplanted to the West, and came to exert a marked influence on later Christological thought. His teachings were even more openly pantheistic than those of his Oriental masters, and his denial of the reality of derived existence and his thoroughgoing Docetism make it extremely difficult to interpret much of the language in which he strives to give a certain value to the historical facts of redemption. While asserting that Christ took upon Him the form of a servant and human nature in its entirety, he shows at once how little his language accords with common sense usage by saying that the human nature that the Word assumed contains in itself the entire visible and invisible creation. Christ's mission was to call back effects into causes, and thus to prevent causality itself from perishing. Thus in assuming and renovating human nature He renovated the whole of the creation visible and invisible. In assuming and renovating human nature thus with its universal contents, raised it in Himself above all that is visible, and converted it into His Deity. He saved the entire human nature which He entirely assumed entirely in itself and entirely in the entire race. Entire humanity is exalted in Him and sits at the right hand of God, having become God in Him. It is manifest that such conceptions of incarnation leave no place for evangelical views of sin or redemption. By his seeming recognition of the historical life of Christ he can have meant only to set forth belief in a theophany which had the effect of furthering and facilitating the rise of men above theophanies to the archetypal (cf. Dorner, II. ii. 294 ff.).

9. A far more evangelical type of mystical Christology is found in the writings of Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1114) and Richard of St. Victor (d. 1173). In them the theosophy of Erigena was transformed into ecstatic enjoyment of God Himself. They were unable to find satisfaction in the Church doctrine of the transubstantiation of the bread and the wine into the body and the blood of Christ as the form in which Christ may be enjoyed, but yearned for a spiritual union with Christ, the transubstantiation of the believer by an ecstatic exaltation into a mystical union with Christ. The Christology of Hugo and Richard was clearly that of the pseudo-Dionysius and of Erigena; but with them the Incarnation was conceived of more distinctly as a historical fact, and the ecstatic union of the believer with Christ did not so clearly involve loss of individual consciousness and virtual absorption.

10. The pantheistic features of the teaching of Erigena found their most extreme development in Amalric of Bena (d. 1204), who identified God with the world and with man. Yet he did not wholly ignore the historical, and maintained that God revealed Himself as Father in Abraham, as Son in Mary, and as Holy Spirit daily in us. He declared that we are the natural members of Christ, because the identical soul of Christ dwells in all good men. Spiritual exaltation from Christ dwelling in us emancipates us from all moral obligation, and makes sins of the flesh a matter of indifference.

11. More profoundly philosophical but scarcely less destructive to the Christology of the NT and to true religion was the mysticism of Master Eckhart (d. c. 1327). He refused to recognize any distinction between man and God, in nature or in persons. All creatures he regarded as a 'pure nothing.' Every believer is God's only-begotten son in the same sense in which this is true of Christ. 'Whatever God the Father has given to His only-begotten Son in human nature, He has given wholly to me. Here I except nothing, neither union nor sanctity.' 'Whatever the Sacred Scripture says concerning Christ is also absolutely true of every good man.' Eternal generation applies to every good man as fully as to Christ. In fact, man as well as God may be said to have created the heaven and the earth, and to have generated the eternal Word.

12. In John Tauler (d. 1361) we have a highly Neo-Platonic mode of thought combined with the most devout and heartfelt recognition of the Incarnation and the propitiatory sufferings of Christ as absolutely necessary for our salvation. Christ's being is cause, essence, and beginning in relation to all things. He is the life of the living, the resurrection of the dead, the restorer of the deformed and disordered who have corrupted and spoiled themselves by sin, the beginning of all light, the illumination of all those who are illuminated, the revealer of obscurity according to what it is proper for us to know, and the beginning of all beginning. His being is inconceivable and unspeakable, and without names. In becoming flesh and making atonement for the guilt of humanity He is its Redeemer. The Holy Spirit took of the most pure blood of the virginal heart of Mary, which was glowing with the powerful flame of love, and created of it a perfectly pure little body with all its members, and a pure clean soul, and united these together. This soul and body, the Person of the Son of God, who is the eternal Word and the reflexion of the Father's glory, from genuine love and mercy, for the sake of our blessedness, took upon Himself and united with Himself into the unity of the Person. Thus the Word became flesh and dwelt with us. humanity of Christ he regarded as even in the humiliation permeated by the Divine, and sharing in the possession and use of the Divine attributes. The same was true even when He suffered and died on the cross. According to its lower powers Christ's soul was subject to needs. From this point of view he could say that not a drop of His Deity came for one moment to the help of His poor agonizing humanity in all its needs and in its un-speakable sufferings. Tauler is never weary of emphasizing the importance of the death of Christ. He speaks of the whole human race as fallen into eternal death and the eternal wrath of God, with the loss of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter. Christ broke the bands of eternal death in His death on the cross, and made a complete peace and reconciliation between man and the Heavenly Father. This reconciliation is confirmed by the gift of the Holy Spirit. The sufferings and death of Christ he regarded as an equivalent for man's guilt, as a fulfilling of the Law which we were under obliga-tion to fulfil, in that He suffered in our place and on our behalf. Tauler dwelt with great persistence and with remarkable pathos on the details of the sufferings of Christ and His infinite love for the souls of men. It will not be practicable to give here any further phases of mystical Christological thought. 13. Scholastic Christology next demands attention. Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109), in some respects the most important of the mediæval theologians, wrought out no new theory of the Person of Christ; but his satisfaction theory of the Atonement, involving the abandonment of the supposition that the death of Christ was a ransom paid to the devil, and basing the necessity of the death of the God-man on the infinite weight of sin and its infinite offence to the honour of God, was an important contribution to soteriology. faction to the Divine majesty could not be made by man, seeing that he is finite, or by the Son of God alone, seeing that He owed no satisfaction; but it must be made by the God-man. While perpetuating the Augustinian modes of thought as they had been modified by Gregory the Great, Alcuin, etc., Anselm was also greatly influenced by the Neo-Platonic semi-pantheism of Erigena. In opposition to the tritheism of Roscellinus, which seemed to him to require the Incarnation of Father, Son, and Spirit, and not of the Son alone, as the means of man's redemption, he insisted that it was impossible for Father and Spirit to become man. The Incarnation merely accomplished the union of the Divine and human personalities, and not the union of the Divine and human natures. Divine Person became man and formed one Person with the humanity assumed, but not the nature. There was no transformation of Deity into humanity or of humanity into Deity. Not the Divine nature but the Person of the Son became man. If the Divine Person alone and not the Divine nature took part in the Incarnation, it is plain that we cannot speak of the three Persons having become man in Christ, unless we hold that several persons could become one person (Dorner, II. i. p. 442 ff.). Anselm as a Realist insisted that in the Incarnation the Logos united Himself not with an individual man, but with impersonal humanity, in this opposing the Nominalists, who insisted that the humanity of Christ was individual and personal.

14. Abelard (d. 1142) was essentially Sabellian in his doctrine of the Trinity, and insisted that, being unchangeable, God could not have become something which He was not eternally. He rejected such expressions as 'God is man,' 'Man became God.' He affirmed 'God did not become anything in and through the Incarnation.' He preferred to say in effect, 'in the man Jesus, God worked'; that 'in Jesus the wisdom of God revealed itself, in order to lead men to salvation by doctrine and example' (Theologia Christiana, iv. 13). This thought he is never weary of iterating and enforcing, that whatever our Lord did in the flesh was for our instruction by way of example. This includes His walk, His death, and His resurrection. He regarded Incarnation in the proper sense of the term as unthinkable and impossible, because of his conception of the omnipresence and the unchangeableness of God.

15. Peter Lombard (d. 1160), in his Sentences, which became the text-book of medieval scholasticism and thus exerted a moulding influence upon later scholastic thought, asked and sought to answer nearly every conceivable question re-specting Christ. His great master was John of Damascus; but he was well acquainted with Augustinian thought, and no doubt with the works of Anselm and Abelard. He was also somewhat familiar with Neo-Platonic modes of thought without being overmastered by them. He sees no reason why Father or Holy Spirit might not have become incarnate, but finds especial appro-priateness in the fact that He who created the world should deliver it, that He who proceeded from another rather than He who is self-existent should be sent on the mission of redemption. would have been less fitting for Him who is Father in heaven to become Son in the sphere of revelation. The human nature that the Son assumed comprised body and soul, the substance of humanity. This humanity, which was impersonal, was free from any stain of sin; yet, because He so willed, the liability to punishment which clung to humanity in general remained. Though as regards His flesh He descended from Adam and Abraham, He did not sin in Adam, there being no concupiscence in His conception. The question then arises, whether the Personality or the nature of the Son assumed humanity. As he felt the necessity of maintaining that the Son, as distinguished from the Father and the Spirit, became incarnate, and as nature is what the Persons of the Godhead have in common, while personality connotes the distinctions in the Godhead, he could only answer that the Personality and not the nature of the Son assumed humanity (against Augustine). But he seems to have held that in and through the Son the Divine nature as such united itself with, and appropriated to itself, humanity. Yet, in agreeappropriated to itself, humanity. Yet, in agreement with John of Damascus and the Antiochene theologians of the 4th cent., he thought it advisable to avoid the expression 'the Divine nature became flesh.' In further discussing the signifi-cance of the Incarnation, he rejects the Eutychian and the Nestorian views of the union of Divine and human in the Person of Christ. He denies that out of the two natures was formed a single compound nature. The Word of God, on the con-trary, was simply clothed with body and soul as with a garment, in order that He might appear in virtually denied the reality of the union, and reduced to a mere theophany the Incarnation of the Son. The humanity being regarded as a non-essential, accidental feature of the Son of God, its end and aim was solely that of manifestation, and God might for this purpose have used some other means for helping man than that of Incarnation. He regarded Christ's mediatorial work as accomplished by His humanity alone, the Divine nature remaining apart by itself. We are reconciled with the Son as with the Father and the Spirit. The entire Trinity blots out our sins through the mediation of the humanity of Christ. The work of atonement is accomplished chiefly, if not exclusively, by Christ in His humanity setting forth by His sufferings the fact of God's reconciliation, and by thus awakening in men love for God and a desire to follow Christ's example of love to God and self-sacrifice for men. In some passages he seems virtually to deny that God became objectively a man in Christ, and to maintain that the humanity of God was a purely subjective conception of the human mind. Moreover, reconconception of the numan mind. Moreover, reconciliation was not really effected by Christ, but God intended that His life and death should be regarded as propitiatory. His denial of personality to the humanity of Christ necessitated his denial of the growth of Christ in grace and wisdom. Peter Lombard's denial that God became anything through the Incarnation which He was not before, involves the doctrine more fully wrought out by his successors and known in the history of doctrines as Nihilianism. This conclusion had already been reached by Abelard (see above); but the general orthodoxy of Peter Lombard gave it increased importance.

16. Gerhoh of Reichersberg (d. 1169) protested most earnestly against the Nestorianism or Nihilianism involved in the teachings of Abelard and Peter Lombard, and maintained that 'the man born of the virgin mother is in truth also to be called the Most High, not only in the nature of the Word always most high, but also in His human nature that has been exalted even to the point of sitting with God the Father.' He claimed for the humanity of Christ 'the same glory, omnipotence, omnisapience, omnivirtue, omnimajesty, which belong to the Most High Father,' and held that 'the man in Christ is to be adored with worship' in the highest sense. 'Christ who is everywhere, according as He wills, cannot be shut up in a place, however beautiful or desirable.' The body of Christ's o grew, became so dilated, that it filled the whole world.' Again he speaks of Christ's bear world.' Again he speaks of Christ's body as 'a spiritual body that has overstepped every limitation of time and space.' Thus we see in this German theologian a strong reaction against French Nominalism towards the Realism of Eutychianism and Neo-Platonism, which was to go to the utmost extreme in German Mysticism (see above) and to be perpetuated in Lutheranism.

17. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) built upon the foundations of his Scholastic predecessors, and was much influenced in his Christology by the works of John of Damascus and the pseudo Dionysius. Like most of the mediæval theologians, he denied the necessity of Incarnation apart from human sin; yet he guarded carefully against representing it as a mere accident as regards God, a mere assumption of flesh by God as a garment. He insisted upon a personal union of God with humanity; and yet denied that 'the Divine I could not so assumed one human nature that it could not assume another.' 'That which is uncreated cannot by a created thing.' While he be comprehended by a created thing.' While he opposed the Nihilianism of Abelard and Peter Lombard, he yet minimized the part taken by the Divine essence in the Incarnation. Like most of his mediæval predecessors, he denied the person-ality of the humanity in Christ. Personality it found in the Logos as a distinction Divinely conferred. Like Peter Lombard also, he maintained that not the Divine nature (which would involve Father and Spirit as well as Son), but only the Divine Person of the Son, became in any sense united with humanity in the Incarnation. This united with humanity in the Incarnation. This union bestowed upon humanity nothing of the union bestowed upon humanity nothing of the Divine nature, but only such created graces as humanity was able to appropriate. 'The soul of Christ is a creature, having finite capacity.' This creaturely grace was bestowed in perfection at the moment of incarnation in such measure that its increase is inconceivable. Christ's knowledge did not embrace the Divine knowledge, it being 'impossible for any creature to comprehend the Divine essence.' Whatever has been, is, or will be, was within the sphere of the comprehension of Christ's soul in the Word; but not the knowledge of the possible, involving a knowledge of the Divine essence. Thus even the time of the Divine judgment which Christ professed not to know He really ment which Christ professed not to know He really knew, but was ignorant of only in relation to others. Thomas also denied omnipotence to the soul of Christ on the same ground. Only as the instrument of Deity could the human soul exert superhuman influence. He maintained that in Christ there were two wills, a Divine, which was the active cause of all He did, and a human, which was purely instrumental. In the human will he distinguished between the sensuous (sensitiva) will and the rational will, the former sometimes willing things other than God willed, but not contrary things; the latter co-operating and harmonizing perfectly with the will of the Word. Yet, while his human will was free, Christ did not have the power to decide for Himself, but was determined by God. Like Peter Lombard, Thomas ascribed Christ's mediatorial function to His humanity and not to His Deity. He agreed with most of his predecessors in denying the necessity of the Incarna-tion and suffering of the Son for man's salvation, maintaining that without injustice God might have freely pardoned human sin. Yet he recog-nized the propriety of the plan of redemption actually adopted. The very least degree of suffering on the part of the God-man would have sufficed. He finds difficulty in reconciling Christ's sufferings with His blessed fruition, and reaches the conclusion that the higher aspect (the essence) of His soul continued in perfect fruition while the lower suffered. It is evident that this great thinker, while rejecting Eutychianism, Nestorian-ism, and Adoptianism, failed to reach a self-consistent view of the relation of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ.

18. We must conclude our survey of Scholastic Christology with some account of the contribution of John Duns Scotus (d. 1308). Although Scotus differed in many respects from Thomas, and gave his name to a party antagonistic to the latter (Scotists versus Thomists), in Christology he was content for the most part to follow in the path that had been so well beaten by Thomas and his predecessors. Like these, he maintained that the union of the Divine and the human was only a relation so far as the Divine was concerned, and that for the Divine to become anything that was not eternal is inconceivable. More than was not eternal is inconceivable. Thomas he laid stress on the relative independence and separateness of the human in Christ. Independence he regarded as indispensable to perconsists. He supposed that the human nature of Christ was such that it would have attained to personality apart from the Word; yet a personality dependent on God, and not, like the Divine, incommunicable. More than Thomas also he kept clear of Adoptianism, and guarded against representing Christ's humanity as a selfless husk (Dorner). He regards Christ's humanity by virtue of Divine predestination and grace as exalted to a dignity not possessed by nature. Scotus had an exalted idea of human nature as such, and attributed to it a capacity for the Divine that enabled it through the Word to gain an intuitive view of creation that may be said to be infinite in its scope. In the Incarnation the infinite ethical susceptibility of the human soul was filled by the infinite God. He did not regard the humanity as merely passive and instrumental. In joining itself with the will of the Son that was seeking union with humanity, the human will of Jesus was not passive, but being wrought upon by the Divine it determined itself to increasing susceptibility to the Divine. He attributes to the humanity of Christ growth in knowledge and volition, and suffering of soul and body. He regards as miraculous and inexplicable the fact that the Divine nature did not swallow up the human so as practically to annihilate it, but rather caused it to retain its true humanity. The necessity of supposing the humanity of Christ active in the Incarnation, doubtless had to do with the stress that Scotus laid on the immaculate conception of Mary in whom this activity could be assumed. In some respects Scotus advanced beyond any of the Scholastic theologians in his efforts to solve the mysteries of the Incarnation.

19. The Christology of the Evangelical sects of the mediæval time (Petrobrusians, Henricians, Arnoldists, Waldenses, Taborites, Lollards, and Bohenian Brethren) may be characterized in general as naïvely Biblical, and accordant with that of the orthodox teachers of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. Much of the mediæval Evangelical Christology, as well as much of the Anabaptist Christology that was its outgrowth, savoured strongly of Adoptianism. This was no doubt due in part to the widespread influence of the Paulicians, who were transported in large numbers from Armenia to Bulgaria by the Eastern Empire during the early Middle Ages. All the Evangelical sects of that era laid the utmost stress upon obedience to the precepts of Christ, especially the Sermon on the Mount, and on following the example of Christ. While they kept the humanity of Christ constantly before them, they worshipped Him as God, repudiating utterly all Mariolatry, and all worship of images, holy places, saints, martyrs, etc. They seem not to have concerned themselves at all about the relations of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ, but to have been content with the NT representations accepted in a devout and simple-minded way. It is probable that nearly all of them would have accepted without hesitation the so-called Apostles' Creed, but would have hesitated to accept the so-called Athanasian Creed. The inquisitors frequently charge the Waldenses and related parties with denying the true Deity of Christ, although they had the profoundest reverence for Him and gladly gave their lives for Him. The Catharistic sects, following the Gnostics and Manichæans of the earlier time, denied the true Deity of Christ (regarding Him as one of many angelic beings or emanations), and the reality of His Incarnation and suffering.

Chiliastic views were widely prevalent among the heretical offshoots of the Franciscans, Joachimites, Olivists (followers of Peter Olivi), Taborites, etc.

20. The idolatrous disposition of the Greek and Roman Catholic Churches in the mediæval times created an insatiable demand for holy objects connected with the Person and the life of Christ (articles of clothing, fragments of the cross, etc.), and especially for portraits and statuettes produced from life by contemporaries or miraculously formed. In the East the ikons, as they existed at the beginning of the Middle Ages (close of the Iconoclastic Controversy), which had long before become conventionalized, furnished the models for all later productions, and little scope was given to the imagination of the artist or the exploitation of fraudulent antiquities. In the West unlimited license was given to both. The Abgar picture (see ABGAR), whether what purported in the 4th cent. to be a contemporary portrait had been preserved or not, was sure under the circumstances to re-appear in the mediaval West, and it could hardly have been expected that one church would be allowed to enjoy a monopoly of an object at once so desirable and so easily made. There is no sufficient foundation for the story that the handker-chief-portrait remained in Edessa till 944, whence it was taken to Constantinople by Imperial order, and thence went to Italy in the 14th cent., presumably in connexion with the Crusades. It is not likely that so perishable an article would have lasted for six centuries, to say nothing of the thousand years that have elapsed since its supposed removal from Edessa, and the ecclesiastics of the mediæval time were so unscrupulous in providing themselves with revenue - producing holy objects that no dependence can be placed on their accounts of their sources. It may safely be assumed that neither the Roman, the Genoese, nor the Parisian handkerchief portrait is that which long abode in Edessa, and that all alike are of mediæval or later origin, though the Genoese or medieval or later origin, though the Genoese enjoys the honour of having been pronounced genuine by Pius IX. Even more manifestly spurious and lacking in antiquity is the so-called Veronica portrait, said to have been transferred by Boniface VIII., in 1297, from the Hospital of the Holy Spirit to St. Peter's in Rome. Those who have been vouchsafed a glimpse of the sacred object represent it as almost completely faded out. The legend is that a pious woman (according to some the woman cured of the issue of blood), moved with compassion for Jesus, as, bleeding and sweating, He was going to the cross, gave Him her head-cloth to wipe His face with, and that Jesus imprinted His features upon it and returned it to her as a token of love. The name Veronica was by some supposed to be the Latin equivalent of the name of the woman; but by others it is taken to mean 'true image,' as etymologically it might. The Roman Church has canonized this purely mythical woman as St. Veronica. The picture, according to copies made before it faded out, represents an oval bearded face with thin hair reaching to the temples, eyes closed, and a somewhat agonized expression. This inartistic picture became a model for Correggio and other artists of the later Middle Ages. The stories about the sweat - cloth image, and probably pictures purporting to be the original, may have found place as early as the 7th or 8th cent.; but those exhibited in the mediæval and later times were probable of the medi ably of purely mediæval origin, and were no doubt freely produced as they were needed. Rome was not allowed to monopolize the 'original' Veronica portrait, Milan and Jaen having put forth rival Many other pictures, equally lacking in authenticity and with similar claims to antiquity, were produced and exhibited during the Middle Ages, portraits of the earlier time (4th cent. onward) being for the most part taken as models. The symbolical representation of Christ as a fish was perpetuated from the earlier time. Christ as the Good Shepherd, with the face of a beardless youth, was a common form of representation during the Middle Ages, as earlier. It is the opinion of many that the artists of the Renaissance, while influenced to some extent by the older portraits, drew freely on pagan materials, using especially the earlier representations of Æsculapius to aid their imagin-ations in depicting the ideal Christ. Crucifixes with agonized face and bleeding wounds were freely used during the Middle Ages. It needs scarcely be said that the Evangelical and Catharistic parties utterly repudiated the use of pictures of Christ and crucifixes as idolatrous.—See CHRIST IN ART.

ALBERT HENRY NEWMAN.

CHRIST IN REFORMATION THEOLOGY.is commonly said that the whole Christian Church has taken its doctrine of the Person of Christ from the Eastern Church, and simply adopted the definitions formulated at the Councils of Nicæa, Constantinople, and Chalcedon; and further, that at the Reformation the Reformers contented themselves with brushing away the meaningless refinements of the Scholastic divines of the Middle Ages, and accepted without change the conclusions come to in the Councils of the undivided Church. Neither of these statements is strictly accurate. They have this basis of truth that both East and West accepted the same forms of sound words, and professed the Creeds and verbal definitions sanctioned by the Œcumenical Councils down to that of Chalcedon, but they do not take into account the fact that verbal statements may cover a great deal of divergence in intellectual views— a divergence which in the present case was not merely in intellectual conception, but represented

The Western Church owed very little to the Eastern, and had a Christology of its own with a clearly marked history, from Tertullian to Augustine; and its intellectual definitions corresponded to a definite type of Christian piety. Athanasius and Augustine alike dwell on the mystery lying in the union of the Divine and the human in the Person of Christ the God-man, and can express their thought in the same language; but for Athanasius the mystery lies in the union of two natures, while for Augustine the mystery lies in the Person. 'My Saviour,' says Athanasius, 'must be the great God who made heaven and earth; and He must unite the human and Divine natures which He possesses, in a union which for me is a mystery to be believed, but which my intelligence can never explain or penetrate.' The Greek type of piety fed itself on the mysterious union of natures; the Incarnation was the central thought in Christianity, and salvation appeared to the Eastern Church as a species of diffusion of the Incarnation: men were saved when they were the Incarnation: men were saved when they were absorbed in the Divine. Augustine felt as strongly the need for a Saviour who was both God and man; and, inheriting the theology tradition of the West, first established by Tertullian and confirmed by Ambrose of Milan, he found a clue to a statement of the Person of Christ in the NT phrases, 'the form of God,' and 'the form of a screant,' and held that these two forms coexisted in the unity of the Person (see above n. 8544) in the unity of the Person (see above, p. 854). There was no mystery in the natures. They did not coalesce or blend or unite so far as the natures themselves were concerned. The Person possesses both these forms simultaneously; the one and the same Person was at one and the same time in the form of God and in the form of a servant; and in this unity of the Person lay the mystery. 'Filius

Dei semper, filius hominis ex tempore, tamen unus Christus ex unitate personæ. In cœlo erat quando in terra loquebatur. Sic erat filius hominis in cœlo, quomodo filius Dei erat in terra; filius Dei in terra in suscepta carne, filius hominis in cœlo in unitate personæ.' All believers feel this unity so very strongly that they instinctively create this unity of the Person for themselves. The unity exists in the heart of every Christian. The common Christian thought is that there is a Man in whom God dwells, and who is God. This is the mystery of the Person. 'Proprium illius hominis sacramentum est.'

It is evident that the piety which dwells on the mystery of the Person as opposed to the mystery of the union of the natures has its attention directed to the personal saving acts rather than to the passive condition of incarnation, and sees its salvation worked out for it in the life, death, and rising again of the Divine Person, rather than in the diffusion of the Incarnation. Thus two types of Christian piety correspond to the two differing intellectual conceptions of where the mystery lies in the Person of Christ, and each can accept the same verbal definitions.

Luther and all the Reformers held the Western conception of the Person of Christ. For Luther and for Calvin the most venerated creed was the Western symbol which is called the Apostles' Creed, which in its old Roman form can be traced back to the first half of the 2nd century. Luther and Calvin both placed it in their catechisms for children. Calvin declares that the whole of his Institutio is its exposition, and Luther always understood the Nicene and the Athanasian Creeds to be explanations of the Apostles' Creed. For Luther, as for Augustine, Jesus is a Man in whom God dwells, and who is God.

Luther, as for Augustine, Jesus is a Man in whom God dwells, and who is God.

Luther always declared that he accepted the doctrine, and nothing but the doctrine, of the ancient Church on the Person of Christ. 'No one can deny,' he says, 'that we hold, believe, sing, and confess all things in correspondence with the Apostles' Creed, that we make nothing new therein, nor add anything thereto, and in this way we belong to the old Church, and are one with it.' The Schmalkald Articles and the Augsburg Confession begin with stating over again the doctrines of the Old Catholic Church, founding on the Nicene Creed, and quoting Ambrose and Augustine; and Luther's contention always was that, if the sophistry of the Schoolmen could be cleared away, the old doctrines of the ancient Church would stand forth in their original purity. When he spoke of the Scholastic Theology as sophistry, he attached a definite meaning to the word. He meant not merely that the Schoolmen played with the outsides of doctrines, and asked and solved innumerable trivial questions, but also that the imposing edifice they erected was hollow within, and had nothing to do with the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He maintained that in the heart of the system there was, instead of the God whom Jesus had revealed, the abstract entity of pagan philosophy, an unknown deity—for God could never be revealed by metaphysics. All this sophistry he swept away, and then declared that he stood on the ground occupied by the theologians of the ancient Church, whose faith was rooted in the triune God, and in belief in Jesus Christ the Revealer of God. The old theology had nothing to do with Mariolatry or with saint-worship; it revered the triune God and Jesus Christ, His Son, the Saviour of mankind. Moreover, Luther believed, and rightly believed, that for the Fathers of the ancient Church, the theological doctrines in which they expressed their conceptions about God and the Person of Christ were no dead formulas, but were the expression of a living Christian perience, and it is the opinion of Ad. Harnack that the Church had no genius between Augustine and Luther. No one realised that a supreme atterance of faith like St. Bernard's had no genius between Augustine and Lither No one realized that a supreme atterance of faith this St. Burnard's hymn—

'Jesus, our only joy be Thou,

As Thou our prize wilt be:

Jesus, be Thou our give; now,

And through etern ty'

and such experience as Biols expression there, formed any part of the material of theology. And so theology inhead its opportunities of serving the Church. Had theology undertaken the task of understanding and interpreting words like these, it would have cleared the path to new truth, and set pious out free. As it was, for want of its proper food, theology languished, and simple saints, though at times maring on the wings of faith, still carried their crutches lovingly about with them. They still believed in an exclusive presethood, in magnesi weramental grace, in pravers to mints, and works of merit and Papal day passantons. Even the 'Brethren who, all through the Middle Ages, pointedly grooved the exclusionation's of merit and Papal day impulse to state a theology of their own. For centuries the breath of pure devotion to Christ never fertilized the learning of the schools, and no genius aruse—no great churchman in whom personal religion was the imperation of a mind at once critical and constructive. Not till Staupits, on his vant to Luther's convent, recommended the old Genium theology of Tailer to the youthful is holar-monk, did the secret of Christian plety once more find lodgment in the soul of a religious genium, who may how to make the thoughts of faith suprame throughout the whole sphere of religion in church life, in ritual and theology, as well as in the lonely heart. Through Luther came the reducovery that there was theological material in the living experience of Christian souls. And since in the Christian soul (thrist in always enthroned, this amounted to a rediscovery of the place of thrist in theology. Directing Itself thus to experience, theology realized that its important task is not to experience, theology realized that its important task is not to experience, the

But if Luther accepted the old formulas describing the nature of God and the Person of he did so in a thoroughly characteristic Christ, way. He desired to state them in plain German, so that they could appeal to the 'common man.' Neither he nor any of the Reformers believed that theology, which for them was, or ought to be, the most practical of all disciplines, was a secret science for experts, described in a language which must be unintelligible to the multitude. He confessed with some impatience that technical theological terms were sometimes necessary, but he did not like them, and he used them as little as possible.

'Quodai odit amma mea vocem homoourion, et nolim sa uti, non harcticus eve, quis enim me coget uti, modo rem tenesin, qua in onordio per eripturas definita est '(Efrançes ed Lat. axxvi 506). Lake Athanasius, he preferred the word onenear to express the relation hetween the Persons in the Trimity. He exceed the definition of the term Trimity or its German equivalents. Dres falloshest, brocket. 'Dresialitykets et ein racht bose Bestach, denn in der Geotthest ist die hockete Einzgkeit. Etilche nennen in Dreiheit, aber das lautet auximpotitisch. Etilche nennen in Dreiheit, aber das lautet auximpotitisch. darum lautet es auch kalt, und viel bemer sprach mass Gott denn die Dresiality hets' (Erlangen?, xi 498). He casiled the technical terms unged in the old creeds socious mathematics, and did not use any of them in his Small or Large Catechians. Quodel odit amina mea vocets Asset oueson, et nolles es uti.

In framing his conception of what was meant by the Person of Christ, Luther, like all the Reformers, started from the saving work of the Re-He approached the Person of Christ from our Lord's mediatorial work, and not from any metaphysical way of thinking what Godhead must be, and what manhood must be, and how Godhead and manhood can be united. He rises from the office to the Person, and does not descend

from the Person to the office.

'Christ is not called Christ because He has two natures. What does that matter to use? He bears this glorious and conforting name because of His office and work which He has undertaken! (16 xil 244).

It is a true appreciation of His work that leads to a real knowledge of His Person. 'He who, with Peter, has a true view of the office which Christ must exercise in the world, and effect with se, must conclude with Peter that Christ must be fold in like commissioned (16 xl. 286). 'To remove from us the burden of sun death, hell, and the devit, and to vanquish their power, and to bring again righteouneum, life and salvation, set the works neither of mem nor of angels, but only of the One, Etarnal, Divine Majesty, the Crustov of heaven and earth.

Therefore must this seed of Abraham be true, everlasting, Almighty God, equal to the Father from all eternity '(i.b. xix. 18). He who accomplished an effectual redemption for fallen and enslaved humanity must needs be Divine. The idea of a redeemper of man, Ifitmeell no more than man, or rather, Himsell less than the one eternal God, was to Luther an abundity. Radamption and Godhead were inseparably bound together

So, like Athanasius, Luther found in his salvation the proof of the Divinity of the Saviour. Beneath all the reasonings of the great Alexandrian there lay his fundamental Christian experience that the Saviour who redeemed him must be the great God who made heaven and earth. It was the same with Luther.

earth. It was the same with Luther.

In the second article on the Creed in his Caschima, he mays, "This means that I believe that Jema Christ, true God . . . is my Lord who has redeemed me," and again." "We must have a Barbour who is more than a mint or an angel, for if He were no better and greater than these, there were no belying ms. But if He be God, then the treasure is so ponderous that it outweighs and lifts away sin and death, and not only so, but also gives eternal life. This is our Christian faith, and therefore we rightly confess. "I believe in Jesus Christ He only Son, our Lord, who was born of Mary, suffered and disd." By this faith bold fast, and though heather and heretic are ever so wise, thou shall be blessed (Erlangen et alvis. 3, 4).

Jeaus Christ was for Luther the mirror of the fatherly heart of God, and therefore was God; God Himself was the only Comforter who could bring rest to the human soul burdened by sin and grief; and the Holy Spirit was God. The old creeds confessed One God, Father, Son, and Holy thoet, and the confession contented him, whatever words were used. Besides, he rejoiced to place himself side by side with the Christians of the ancient days, who were free from the sophistries of the Schoolmen, and to feel that he also belonged to the ancient Church, the communion of

But although Luther and the other Reformers coepted the theology of the ancient Church and introduced its creeds into the reformed services of public worship, they put a richer meaning into the doctrine of the Person of Christ than had ever been done before their day; and the thought of the Divinity of Christ meant more to them than it had done to their early predecessors. Jesus, the Saviour, seemed to be God in a more intimate way to them than to the earlier divines. The old theology had stated the doctrine of the Two Natures in Person of Christ, in such a way as to suggest that the only function of the Divine nature was to give to the human work of the Saviour such an importance as to make it effective. This is seen in Augustine, in Anselm, and in the Reformed Scholastics of the 17th century. Luther and his fellow-Reformers always refused to take this limited way of regarding the Divinity of Christ. They did not refuse the expression 'Two Natures in One Person,' but Luther makes it plain that the words suggested an idea which he believed to be wrong, and which had to be guarded against. He declares frequently that we must beware of thinking that the Deity and the humanity of Christ are united in such an external fashion that we may look at the one apart from the other. we see Jesus, we perceive God and man really and intimately united.

'This is the first principle and most excellent article, how Christ is the Father: that we are not to doubt that whatsoever the man says and does is reckneed, and must be reckneed, as said and done in heaven for all angels; and in the world for all such and done to reave nor all angels; and in the world for all yders, in hell for all devils in the heart for every evil con-science and all secret thoughts. For if we are certain of this that when Jesus thinks, speaks, wills, the Father also wills, then I defy all that may light against me. For here in Christ have I the Fathers heart and will' (Erlangen ed. xiix. 185, 184).

Luther's sense of the rich and full Divinity of Christ is not won at the expense or neglect of humanity On the contrary, he believed that the reason why the Schoolmen had made so many mistakes was that they had practically omitted the humanity of Christ altogether. They had obscured His humanity by a multitude of conceptions and fancies which Luther could not abide. The legends of meaningless miracles and supernatural claims attributed to the infant Jesus, he characterizes as 'pure foolishnesa.' For it widened the gulf between Him and us. Where a mediaval preacher delighted in recounting marvels taken from apocryphal sources, emphasizing all that tended to put Christ in a different order of being from us, Luther dwelt continually on all His characteristically human traits, on all that made Hun one with us.

The deeper we can bring Christ into our humanity, the better It is, he says in one of his scrittons (Erlangen ed. vi. 355). So his frequent pictures of the boyhood of Jesus are full of touches from the family life of the home at Wittenberg. The touches from the family life of the home at wittenberg. The boy Jenus lived just like other boys, was protected, like them, by the dear angels was suckled at His mother's breast, learned to walk, ate and drank like other children, was subject to flis parents, ran errands for His mother, brought her water from the well, and finely, when He grew up and became stronger, began to ply the axe to help His father (passins). And this, Lather asserted against those who had erected it into an article of faith that Christ thron the first moment of His life was so full of wisdom that there was nothing left for litin to learn. He will have nothing to do with those who ascribe to Christ only a mutilated humanity. By humanity I mean body and soul. And this I wish to emphasize because some, like Photinus and Apollinaris, have tanght that Christ was a man without a human soul, and that the Godhead dwelt in Him in place of the soul '(Erlangen ed. x. 131).

As with every other article of his creed. Luther

As with every other article of his creed, Luther had a practical religious interest in holding so firmly to the humanity of Christ. The human life of Jesus glorified humanity, and was a pledge of the final glory of all redeemed humanity.

'It is,' be says in his exposition of Jn 114, 'the most precious treasure and highest confort that we Christians have, that the Word, the true natural Son of God, became man, having flesh and blood, like any other man, and became man for our sakes, that we might come to the great glory thereby our flesh and blood, skin and hair, hands and feet, belly and back, sit in heaven above, equal to God, so that we can boldly bid defance to the devil and all else that harasses us. We are thus made certain, too, that they belong to heaven and are helri of the heavenly fungdom' (Erlangen ed alvi 124). It was no mere semblance of a man who was now exalted at the Father's right hand, but one who was hone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, to whom no human experience, save sin was foreign, a boy who enjoyed his pays and helped in little household duties, a man who starred the common lot of tool and weariness and temptation, a real unit wing a true human life under conditions not so far is neved from our own. Having life a true bunian life. He understands us fully, and we can know Him, and God through Jim. Through Jim alone can we come to know God. 'Outside of this thirst no other will of God, as to be sought.' Those who speculare about God and His will without Christ, lose God completed '(Walch's ed. vol. v. p. 198).

With the Reformers, therefore, the historical

With the Reformers, therefore, the historical life of Jesus is of the utmost importance, far exceeding all metaphysical dissertations upon the nature of a God man. We can all have naturally a human sympathy with that marvellous hie; but faith, the gift of God, is needed to see the Divine meaning in that life and death. The meaning, put in its briefest form, is that in Jesus we see God appearing in history and addressing man. Hence the Person of Christ was something more than a mere doctrine for them an intellectual something outside us. It must be part of that blessed experience which is called Justification by Faith. It is inseparably connected with the recognition that we are not sived by the good deeds we are really able to do, but solely by the work of Christ. It is what makes us cease to trust all work righteousness, and to confide ourselves to God alone, as He has revealed Himself in Jesus Christ. When we know and feel that it is God who is working on our behalf, then we instinctively cease trying to think that we can work out our own salvation (Erlangen xii. 244) Hence the Person of Christ must always be something more than a mere doctrine for the true Christian. It is something which we carry about with us, as part of our lives.

'To know Jesus in the true way means to know that He died for us, that He piled our sins upon Hinnelf, so that we hold all our own affairs as nothing, and let them all go and cluig only to the faith that Christ has given Hinnelf for us, and that His sufferings and piety and virtues are all mine. When I know this, I must hold Him dear in return, for I cannot help loving such a man.

Here we reach the kernel of the Reformation thought about Christ Jesus, and the master-thought which distinguishes its theology from all previous teaching about God and the Person of Christ.

Luther lets us see, over and over again, that he believed that the only thing worth considering in theology was the Divine work of Christ and the experience we have of it through faith. He did oxperience we have of it through that. It is not believe that there was any real knowledge of God without these limits. Luther, as Ad. Harnack asys, 'in his relation to God, only thought of God at all as he knew Him in Christ.' Beyond tham there is the unknown God of philosophical paganism, the God whom Jews, Turks, and pagans paganiam, the God whom Jews, Turks, and pagans ignorantly worship. No one can really know God save through the Christ of history. Hence, with Luther, Christ fills the whole sphere of God: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' and conversely, 'He that hath not seen me hath not seen the Father.' The historical Jesus Christ is for Luther the revealer, and the only revealer, of the Father. The revelation is given in the marvellous experience of faith in which Jesus compels us to see God in Him-the whole of God, who has kept back nothing which He could have given us. is the distinctive mark of the way in which the Reformers regarded Christ; all theology is Christ-ology; they knew no other God than the God who had manifested Himself in the historical Christ, and made us see in the miracle of faith that He is our salvation.

"There is only one article and rule in theology. He who has not a full and clear group of it is no theologian; namely, true faith and trust in Christ. Into this article all the others flow, and without this they are nothing '(Erlangen ed vol 1 vis 308), 'In my heart there rules alone, and shall rule, this one article, namely, faith on my dear Lord Christ, which is of all my thoughts on things spiritual and Divine, the only beginning, middle, and end '(ib lvis 68).

The early Christians had said of Jesus that He must be conceived of as belonging to the sphere of God (2 Clement, i.: derhoo, olows dei nues possein rep. Inson Xpistol, ws rep. beol.) The Reformers added: and that He fills the whole sphere of God. so that there is room for no other vision of God than that which Christ gives us. This masterthought of Reformation theology simplified Chris tian doctrine in a wonderful way. It justified Luther's rejection of the complicated discussions of the Schoolmen, and his accuration that what he called their 'sophistry' was partly pagan; and it also showed clearly that Christian worship ought to be simplified too.

The reader of the second part of the second book of the Summa Theologic of Thomas Aquinascannot help seeing that the really example as aspirations of the great behoolines are everywhere thearted and finally slain outright because the theological has to start with the thought that God has been first defined as uther the Absolute, or the Primum Mineus, or the Causa effective prima, or the Intelligence of many even indigence, before in the intelligence of the start with the thought that God has been first defined as prima, or the Intelligence on one on our as research Humself to strong, the vision of the Father who has revealed Humself to strong, the vision of the Father who has revealed Humself to six in Jesus Christians to do, the Reformer asked, with a great leternal benething, who is not the world, when they have the Father? tions, of magical sacraments and mints' intercessions, which mass the inediaval Christian life so full of superstitions, and, to all seeming, so empty of Christ. To the mediaval theologian all these could be justified because they came from that justion of the sphere of God which was as it were, beyond Christ. The influence of Christ was exhausted, they thought, when have forgy eness had been won, and the grace needed for all holy living came from operations of the grace of God which did not necessarily come through Jesus Christ. But when the Reformers thought of God they thought of Christ and of Christ alone. The grace of God was always to them the grace of Christ, the Holy Spirit was the spirit of Christ, the presence of Christ, the Holy Spirit was the spirit of Christ, the presence of Christ, and the possession of God was the possession of Christ. They could not, therefore, repard grace as a misterious something different from the soul and outside it, and at the same time different from the soul and outside it, and at the same time different from Christ, and outside life along Christ, who is the whole God. This simplified the Christian life, and swept away at once the whole complex system which had beed so much superstition.

This characteristic of Reformation thought and of Reformation piety, that Christ fills the whole aphere of God, appears everywhere in the writings of the Reformers and in the rites and worship of the Reformed Churches, and may be illustrated, if not exhaustively described, in the following in stances of its application.

1. The Reformers swept away every contemplation of intercessors who were supposed to share with our Lord the procuring of pardon and salva-tion, and they declared against all attempts to distinguish between various kinds of worship, which could only lead pious souls astray from the one worship due to God in Christ The Romah Church said that saints did not receive actual worship, and that images were reverenced only in the same sense as copies of the Scripturea. Calvin has no difficulty in showing that these distinctions were not popularly grasped.

"Such subtle distinctions," he mays, "as latens, doules, hyperdoules, are neither known nor present to the minds of those who prostrate themselves before images until the world has become full of idolatry as crude and plain as that of the ancient Egyptanis, which all the prophets continuously denounced, they can only insisted, and ought to be discarded. They actually suggest to worshippers to pass by Jeans Christ the only Mediator, and betake themselves to some patron who has struck their fancy. They bring it about that the Divine offices are distributed among the saint as if they had been appointed colleagues to our Lord Jeans Christ, and they are made to do ilia work, while He Himself is kept in the background like some ordinary person in a crowd. They are responsible for the fact that hymns are sung in public worship in which the mants are landed with every blessing just as if they were colleagues of God." In this connexion he quotes the "impious stants heard in many churches." Ask the Father, cosmand the Bon, addressed of courie, to the Virgon and the invocation of Bt. Claud as "the life and resurrection of the dead."

In the same was he invested against the doctrine of works of supercropation as derogatory to the merits of Christ, and mys that "In making up the treasury of the Ch irch, the merits of Christ and of the inartyrs are thrown together in the aiump," mixing up the blood of Christ with the blood of martyrs, and forming out of them a heterogenous mass of merits or estantactions."

In conformity with these thoughts, the Confeamons of the Reformation all agree in repudiating prayers to the saints. The Augsburg Confession says:

"The Scripture teacheth not to invoke saints, nor to ask the help of saints, because it propoundeth to us one Christ, the Mediator, Propitatory, High Priest, and Intervenor. This forms to be invocated, and He hath promised that He will hear our prayers and liketh this worship, to wit, that He be invocated in all affections." (I am 2.) In the Necond Helvett Confession in its fifth chapter has slown the rule that prayer is to be through Christ alone, and saints and relies are not to be worshipped. And all grayer books and liturgles in every branch of the Beformed Church, even when taking over, with little alteration, old forms of prayer, carefully exclude addresses to the Virgin or to any of the saints.

In any case, the theoretic distinctions between reverence and worship never applied to the adora-tion of the consecrated host. This even in theory tion of the consecrated host. was absolute worship, and was felt to be abhorrent and profane by the Reformers, who had experienced spiritual communion with the living Christ. Calvin calls it a 'theatrical exhibition.'

2. The Reformers insist on the necessity of Christ, and Christ alone, for all believers. Their confessions abound in expressions which are meant to magnify the Person and work of Christ, and to show that He fills the whole field of believing thought and worship, and, as Reformation theology was based on experience rather than on philosophy, and aimed at expounding the faith of the pious believer rather than at unfolding metaphysical injections, we find a constant reference to the various names and offices of Christ and to the manifold aspects of His work.

The brief Netherlands Confession of 1506 has no fewer than three separate sections on "Christ, the only Mediator and Reconciter," on "Christ, the only Tascher," and on "Christ, the only High Priest and Sacrifice." The Heidelberg or Palatine Catechism, calls Christ 'my faithful Saviour," and says that we can call cornelves Christians, because by faith we are members of Jesus Christ and partakers of His anothting, so that we both confess His Holy Name and present correlves unto Him a lively offering of thankagiving, and in this life may, with ree consistence, fight against sin and Satan, and afterwards presseen, with Christ, an everlasting kingdom over all creatures. The Scota Confession abourds in phrases intended to honour our Lord Jesus Christ. It calls Him, Messah, "Eternal Windom," Emmanuel, 'our Head,' 'our Brother, 'our Phator and great Babop of our Souls, 'Author of Life,' 'Lamb of God,' 'Advocate and Mediantor,' 'the onle His Priest.' The English Praverbook, while for the most part reflecting the stereotyped conclusion of the breviaty per dominion, in the endings of the Collects introduces new forms, such as, 'for the honour of our Advocate and Medianor, Jesus Christ, and through the merits of Jesus Christ our Saviour.' All the Confessions and Liturgies of the Churches of the Reformation abound in the same of similar expressions.

3. The Reformers declare that Christ is the only

3. The Reformers declare that Christ is the only revealer of God.

revealer of God.

"We would never recognise the Father's grace and mercy, says Luther in his Large Catechism, "were it not for our Lord Jesus Christ, Who is the mirror of the Father's heart." "We are not affrayed to cal God our Father," says the boots Confession, "not as meltile because He has created us, quith we have in common with the reprobate, as for that He has given us His onely Son." The instructions issued by the fly nod which met at Bern in 1832 are very emphatic upon this thought, as max he seen from the headings of the various articles (Art. 2) "That the whole doctrine is the unique Christ (Das die gentra leer der egrage Christias syr), (Art. 3) "That God is revealed to the people in Christ alone", (Art. 5) "That the gracious God is perceived through Christ alone, without any other mediation (Art. 6) "A Christian segnon is entirely about any other mediation (Art. 6) "A Christian segnon is entirely about and from Christ. It is said under the third article "His New, in whom we see the Work of God and His Fatherly heart toward us which is not the case where the prescher talks much about God in the heathen incarner, and does not exhibit the same God in the faces of Christ.

The means of this revelation are the Spirit, which all the Confessions unite in declaring to be the gift of Christ, and the Holy Scriptures. claim of the medneval Church to be the sole trustworthy exponent of the Scriptures had barred the way to Christ through the Word, and had driven men to seek contact with Him in the sacraments, a region where they were more at the mercy of ecclesiastical assumption. The Church itself had used the Bible chiefly as a quarry for proof-texts of ecclesiastical dogman. But for the Reformers the Scriptures are the plain man's guide to Christ. In them Christ Himself speaks to each soul.

In their Christ Hirmself speaks to each soul.

In the Formula of Concord it is said that Christ 'offers Himself in the Word as Redeemer'. The Thirty runs Articles of the Church of England my. 'Both in the Off and in the NT eventsating life is offered to manking by Confession mys.' We believe and confess the Scriptures of God sufficient to instruct and make perfect the man of God. So do sufficient to instruct and make perfect the man of God. And neither to depend on nam or angels.' In the decrees of the Bern Nynod (1532) Neitplure is called 'a winness to, a means of access to, and a remembrancer of Christ.' And again it is said that 'the Scripture leads us to Christ and teaches (Him) as the Saviour'.

We thus see clearly that the Reformers' conception of Christ as the revealer of God at once restored the Scriptures to their rightful place in popular religion, and gave to the Bible a new unity. To the medizeral Church it had been a difficult collection of isolated doctrinal texts; to the Reformers it formed a complete book with one centre, the Person of the Redeemer.

5. The conception that Christ filled the whole sphere of God, which was for the Reformers a fundamental and experimental fact, enabled them to construct a spiritual doctrine of the sacraments. which they opposed to that of the medieval Church. It would be unfair to ignore the germ of an evangelical idea even in the materialistic Romah doctrine of transubstantiation. While the way to Christ through the Scripture was barred by the refusal of the Church to place the Bible in the hands of the people, here was one way in which the common man might suppose he got into direct contact with his Redoemer. We see this religious use of this doctrine in its crudest form in the hymn of St. Francis.

Oh, how pure and worthy should be the prior Who touches the living, glorified Jesus. Let the whole earth tremble, Let the heavens thrill with jos. When Christ the Son of God descends in

What made the sacrament holy to Francis was the personal presence of Christ. Nevertheless, the ordinary attitude to the sacraments was grossly superstitions. The doctrine of transubstantiation, interpreting the presence of Christ in a material sense, practically annulled the reference to Christ altogether, and made the sacrament an exhibition of the magic powers of the priesthood. The sacra ments were looked upon as magical channels of Divine grace. The accepted doctrine was, in the words of the decrees of the Council of Florence, that 'while these others (the sacraments of the OT) do not convey grace but only figure the grace given by the Passion of Christ, these sacraments of ours both contain grace and confer it upon the worthy receiver. Thus in theory, as in practice, the sacraments usurped the place of Christ. Now, although it was the various theories about the sacraments that caused the chief differences among the Reformers themselves, Luther, with his the Reformers themselves, Luther, with his mediaval philosophy, insisting that, by virtue of Divine omnipresence, the words, 'This is my body,' aught be literally and physically true; Calvin, with his more spiritual doctrine, insisting that the presence of Jesus is in spiritual power; Zwingli, casting overboard the whole question of the real presence and dwelling only on the memorial aspect of the feast, -still, with all their varying ideas, the Reformers united on the thoughts that the efficacy of the sacraments depended entirely on the promises of Christ contained in His word, and that the virtue in the sacraments consisted in the presence of Christ to the believing communicant. What was received in the sacrament was not a vacue, my sterious, not to say magical, grace, but Christ Jesus Himself. He gave Himself in the sacraments, in whatever way His presence might be explained. The efficacy of the sacrament depends on Christ, not on any magnal powers of priests; and what is received in the sacraments is not any mysterious grace, but Christ Himself.

All the Reformers taught that the efficacy of the sacraments depends on the promise of Christ contained in their institution, and they insisted that word and sacrament must always be taken together.

Thus Luther points out in the Babylonish Captivity of the Thus Luther points out in the Babyloniah Captivity of the Church that one clipetion to the Bonniah practice is that the recipients 'never hear the words of the promise which are merret annothed by the prices,' and exhauts his readers never to be a gift of the all proportiant connex to between the word of priving and the solution and in hy Large Catechism he decares that the accounts include the wird. each water as the maid uses to cook with.' The Augeburg Confession mys, 'The ancraments are effectual by reason of the institution and commandment of Christ.' Non Latherm Confessions are equally decided on the necessity of connecting the promise and the words of Christ with the marments. The Second Helvetic Confession says, 'There remains effications in the Church of Ood, Christ's primal institution and consecution of the maraments, so that those who celebrate the marament, not otherwise than the Lord instituted it at the beginning, enjoy even now that primal most glorious consecution of all. And therefore, in the celebration of the sarraments the very words of Christ are recited. The Thirty nine Articles declare that the maraments are effectual because of Christ's institution and promise.' The Headelberg or Platine Catechism of 1863 says that the secraments 'are holy and visible signs ordained of God to the end that He might thereby the more fully declare and seal unto us the promise of the Holy Goopel.' Further against the Roman doctrine of maramental grace we have them Reformation statements. In the articles of the Bern Synod (1852) we are told that the maraments are mysteries of God, 'through which, from without, Christ is proferred to believers.' The First Helvetic Confession (1853) says, concerning the Holy Bopper, 'We hold that in the same the Lord truly offers His Body and His Blood, that is, Hisself, to His own.' The Second Helvetic Confession (1852) declares shat 'the Rody of Christ is in heaven at the right haid of the Father,' and enjoins communicants' to lift up their hearts and not to direct them downwards to the bread. For as the sun, though absent from us in the heaven, is none the less efficaciously present no much more the Bun of righteousness, absent from us he heaven, is none the less efficaciously present no much more and remitted. And alawa, that in the Rupper rights used, Christ Supper the Reformation of the Lord's Table or the Lord's Table in to seek our life and perfection in Jesus Chri

The Reformation was a revolt from a system which removed God far from the common man's understanding by means of metaphysical speculations, and brought Him near only in superstitious and materialistic ways, through sacraments and priests. It was seen again that in Christ God had come close to the ordinary believer, and the appeal to religious experience proved that alike in prayer, in worship, and in teaching, Christ filled the whole sphere of God. Jesus was God appearing in history and addressing man.

CHRIST IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

- The 17th cent is the age of Protestant scholasticism. A strong Catholic reaction had set in which weighed on the minds of the defenders of the Protestant faith, and shackled the freedom of theological thought. In their treatment of the Christological problem, both Lutheran and Reformed theologians clung fervently to the traditions of the past, and to the Confessional theology of the previous century. The main results were regarded as finally attained; and while the religious motive was not wanting, the genial spirit that had guided Luther in his most surprising paradoxes was now weighed down by the love of system and scholastic disputation. Instead of reconsidering the first principles involved, the orthodox theologians wasted their ingenuity in inventing distinctions to conceal the most obvious doctrinal inconsistemmen.

1. The Lutheran Church led the way in this scholastic development, by its endeavours to set in clearer light the unity of the God-manhood of Christ. The Formula of Concord (1577, published in the Book of Concord, 1580) struck a compromise between the divergent views of the Brenzian and the Chemnitzian doctrine. It held that the two natures of Christ had direct and real communion with each other; and it condemned as Nestorian the view that rested the unity of Christ upon the unity of the Person, as if the natures were combined in an external way, like two boards glued together. There was a real passing over of the properties of the Divine nature to the human nature; not in the sense that the human nature was essentially altered thereby, or made the Divine properties its own by a 'physical communication' or 'essential transfusion,' but in the sense of a real and permanent communication, such that Christ 'performed all the works of His omnipotence in, through, and with His human nature.' It was admitted that this majesty communicated to the human nature was hidden or withheld during Christ's earthly life; He did not always manifest it, but only when it pleased Him to do so; or (as it is elsewhere expressed) He 'divested Himself of His Divine majesty in the state of His humiliation,' though retaining it through the personal union. By the resurrection this occultation of the Divine majesty came to an end, and He was placed in the plenary use, revelation, and manifestation of all Divine powers, so that 'now not only as God but also as man He knows all things, is able to do all things, and exercises an omnipresent dominion.

This Formula of Concord proved in reality a formula of discord to the Lutheran divines; it was variously interpreted, and not even universally accepted. The theologians of Helmstädt, who followed the more moderate Chemnitzian view, were all the more opposed to the Formula that it was interpreted by the Swabian theologians in a sense that restored the Brenzian tradition. The Swabians presented the doctrine of the Communicatio idiomatum in the most uncompromising form; and, in the most incautious and absolute terms, they attributed the Divine attributes of eternity, omnipresence, omnipotence, and omniscience to the earthly human Christ. For a time the Swabian views prevailed; but something had still to be done to harmonize them with the historical facts of Christ's earthly life. A new controversy arose, in which the differences between Chemnitz and Brenz reappeared in an acuter form, as to what was involved in the state of humiliation, or the extent to which the human Christ had divested Himself of the Divine powers. The controversy raged chiefly between the theologians of Giessen and Tübingen. The theologians of Giessen, following the line of thought of Chemnitz and the divines of Helmetidt. of Helmstädt, endeavoured to reconcile theory with fact by distinguishing between the possession of Divine powers and their use. Looking to the facts of weakness, ignorance, and growing develop-ment in the life of the earthly Christ, they main-tained that, while possessing all Divine properties, Christ did not make use of them in the state of humiliation, but entered on the full exercise of His powers at His exaltation. Only occasionally (miracles, transfiguration) did rays from the Divine majesty shine through; in general the Logos remained quiescent, and the human nature, though Divinely endowed, did not advance to the actuality of exercise  $(\kappa \epsilon r \omega \sigma \iota s \ r \hat{\eta} s \ \chi \rho \hat{\eta} \sigma \epsilon \omega s)$ . This doctrine was contested by the theologians of Tübingen, who regarded the distinction as futile and involving a betrayal of the Lutheran position. They insisted that there would be no real communication of Divine attributes to the humanity unless the human Christ both possessed and used them. They would admit only that the earthly Christ hid His majesty for the time, and usually made a veiled use of His Divinely communicated powers (κρύψε). This theory was apparently more logical than that of the Giessen theologians; but neither could be harmonized with the facts of Christ's earthly life, and the Tübingen theory brought the inconsistency into more startling evidence. The Giessen distinction between use and possession of Divine powers might be applied with some meaning to the property of omnipotence; but it had no con-ceivable meaning as applied to omniscience or omnipresence. But it fared even worse with the Tübingen view when brought face to face with the facts. For how could a Christ who possessed and used the property of omnipresence in His humanity be at the same time and in the same nature circumscribed in time and space? How could a growing intelligence be at the same time endowed with absolute omniscience? Or how could the weak, human, suffering Christ be also in the full exercise of His omnipotence? The Tübingen theologians did their best to solve these startling contradictions by making small concessions, and minute distinctions that concealed these concessions. Thus they maintained that the earthly human Christ exercised His omnipresence not actu naturæ but actu personæ; or, in other words, that the Person exercised it while the human nature remained under limitations—a verbal distinction which left the difficulty where it was. In regard to the omniscience of Christ, which seemed to clash with the fact of His gradual growth in knowledge, they submitted that omniscience was not incompatible with growth in a perfected human nature; and they suspected Mk 13<sup>28</sup>, where Christ confesses His own ignorance, of being an interpolation. Or, again, when pressed with the facts of Christ's suffering and weakness as being inconsistent with a full energizing omnipotence, they admitted that Christ, for the sake of His redemptive work, 'retracted' somewhat of His Divine majesty. They made a distinction between the 'reflex' and the 'direct' use of omnipotence, declaring that Christ, qua Sacerdos, withdrew the reflex use of His majesty with reference to His own body, while He still, qua Rex, exercised the direct use of it in reference to creation.

These explanations of an intelligence that writhed under its own obvious inconsistencies, served only to bring in doubt the reality of Christ's human life, and more moderate views at length prevailed. The Saxon Decision of 1624 expressed a view favourable to the Giessen theology: 'We constantly affirm that He used His royal majesty most freely when, how, and where He would; but we deny that Christ as a man, immediately from His incarnation, always, fully, and universally exerted His Divine majesty of omnipotence and omnipresence, . . . since Christ could not have been taken, crucified, and put to death had He willed to use fully and universally His omnipotence and omnipresence.' The Tübingen theologians adhered to their views till nearly the end of the century, but they became more and more isolated in their opinion. The common Lutheran view was that represented by Quenstedt, the Lutheran Aquinas, who completely systematized the Lutheran doctrine. He held that, from the first moment of the Incarnation, Christ was, even in His human nature, in possession of the Divine majesty, and did exercise it occasionally when His work made it expedient to do so; but He abdicated its plenary use. The human Christ on earth emptied Himself by giving up for the time the glory of the μορφή θεού, i.e. the 'divinæ majestatis plenarius, universalis, et non interruptus sive indesinens usus.' He thus reduced the possession by the human Christ of omnipotence, omnipresence, and omniscience to a mere potentiality. Christ was omnipresent while on earth, but not actu; He was everywhere present in fact, but not in act. He was omnipotent, but He preferred usually to act according to His natural powers. He had the primum actum of omniscience, but not the secundum actum; He had the potentiality of absolutely Divine knowledge, but ordinarily He willed not to use it.

On the whole it must be admitted that the Lutheran theologians had little success in their efforts to unify the God-manhood of Christ. Their well-meant endeavour to supplement the defects of the two-natures theory by a doctrine of inter-communication brought only more prominently into relief the contradictions involved. The further development of doctrine in this century shows that the Lutherans themselves were becoming less sure of their own principles. The old axiom that the human was susceptible of the Divine (finitum capax infiniti) was still maintained in its nonethical sense, but it was surrounded with more definite cautions and limitations. Thus, in order to meet the charge made against them by G. Calixtus, and still more forcibly by the Reformed and the Roman Catholic Churches, that by their doctrine of Communicatio idiomatum they overthrew the distinction between the human and the Divine, they distinguished more carefully than hitherto between a personal and an essential communication of properties. It was insisted that the Divine properties communicated did not become the essential properties of the human nature, but were only personally possessed and exercised. were only personally possessed and exercised. Or, as it was otherwise expressed, the human nature of Christ possessed the Divine powers, not by absolute appropriation ( $\mu \ell \theta \ell \xi \iota s$ ), but by conjunction ( $\kappa \alpha \tau \lambda \sigma \nu \sigma \delta \iota \alpha \sigma \mu \delta \iota \sigma \rho \iota s$ ), but by conjunction ( $\kappa \alpha \tau \lambda \sigma \nu \sigma \delta \iota \alpha \sigma \mu \delta \iota s$ ), but by conjunctionem, Meisner, Hollaz, Buddeus). Still further, it was held that the principle finitum capax infiniti was applicable in the case of Christ element. applicable in the case of Christ alone. It was admitted that human nature was naturally and in general incapable of receiving the Divine powers, and that the human nature of Christ had been endowed with this capacity by a special act of the Divine power. When the principle of the Communicatio idiomatum is thus narrowed down on this side and on that, the old dualism reappears, and the Lutheran doctrine of the thorough union of the Divine and the human is in a state of collapse. Later attempts to rescue the Communicatio idiomatum from oblivion by removing it from its basis, the doctrine of the two natures (Dorner, and still more elaborately H. Schultz, Lehre von der Gottheit Christi), only repeat the mistake of pouring new wine into old bottles; for, as Baur says, when once the duality of natures is abandoned, there can be no further talk of a Communication Schultz tries to verifalise the destrict idiomatum. Schultz tries to revitalize the doctrine in its triple form by an infusion of new ideas which have little historical connexion with it, and which could be better expressed in less scholastic forms.

The different kinds of Communicatio as given by Quenstedt may be here tabulated:—

I. Genus diamaticum, where the qualities of either nature are attributed to the person: (a) when the person is the subject: Christ is eternal: Christ has died; (b) when the concrete human nature is subject: the Son of Man is from heaven; (c) when the concrete Divine nature is subject: God has suffered.

II. Genus apotelesmaticum, marking some activity in the redemptive work in which both natures concur: God is redeemer (i.e. God incarnate): the Son of Man is redeemer (i.e. He who is Son of Man and Son of God): the blood of Christ cleanses (i.e. the blood of Him who is both God and man).

III. Genus majestaticum, the attribution of Divine properties to the human nature: (a) Divina nomina; (b) Opera divina; (c) Cultus divinus; (d) Essentialia Dei attributa: e.g. omnipotence, omnipresence, omniscience.

2. The Reformed Church took a different path. Its theologians held fast to the principle of the Middle Ages, that finite human nature is not capax infiniti; but they applied it, as the Middle Ages had failed to do, to set in stronger relief the reality of Christ's human life. They considered the unity of Christ to be sufficiently safeguarded by the fact of the personal unity and the correspondence of the two natures, and emphasized the distinctness of the natures to the point of being charged with Nestorianism by their Lutheran opponents. Instead of such a communication between the natures as the Lutherans maintained, they were content to think of the human nature of Christ as working in harmony with the Divine through the anointing and activity of the Holy Spirit. Through this Holy Spirit, coming by way of the Logos, the human nature of Christ received certain Divine charisms; but it did not receive the absolute Divine attributes, or any other powers than such as a human nature, remaining human, could receive. as a human nature, remaining human, could receive. Thus they claimed for the human Christ sinless, infallibility in His teaching, and abiding fellowship with God the Father; but they were earnest also in maintaining a true growth in Christ of positive knowledge, holiness, and power. Not even did the risen and exalted Christ surpass the limits of the human, or arrive in His humanity at complete coincidence with the Divine. On the other hand, they balanced this doctrine of a truly human development by the position that the personality of Christ lay in the Logos, who, in assuming this human nature, and appearing on earth in lowly guise, at the same time also remained outside of the human Christ, clothed with all the attributes of heavenly glory. (The Logos was totus in carne, but also totus extra carnem). Their theory results practically in the doctrine of a double life, the eternal life of the Son of God, the pure Logos ex carne, who remains unchanged in heavenly dominion and glory; and the life in time of the man Christ Jesus, the Logos Incarnate, the God-man in lowly form. (This is the interpreta-tion given by Bruce, Humiliation of Christ, 163 ff., Schultz, Gottheit Christi, 180, and others). It may be mentioned, as indicating the growing importance attached to the humanity of Christ, that the idea of Christ's pre-existent humanity gained ground during this century as well among the Reformed as the Lutheran divines. It recommended itself to the Lutheran theologian as exalting the human nature, and affording some support to his doctrine that the whole earthly life of Christ rested on the voluntary self-humiliation of the God -man; while to some of the Reformed side it seemed to explain the position of Christ as the type and instrument of creation, and the medium of revelation prior to the Incarnation.

Comparing the views of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches, we may say that while both adhered to the ancient formula of Chalcedon, the Lutheran Church emphasized the Divinity of Christ, and the Reformed Church the humanity. In the Lutheran field of vision stands the figure of the Divine, omnipotent, omniscient, omnipresent Christ, upon which the humanity hangs like a thin transparent garment; while, for the Reformed Church, the human Jesus of Nazareth stands in the foreground, and the Divinity lies in the background of faith, constituting a union with the human Jesus that is beyond comprehension. It cannot be said that either Church solved the problem of Christ's Person, for indeed no solution is possible on these terms. So long as the Divine and the human are defined by categories that are absolutely inconsistent-omnipotence and weakness, omniscience and ignorance, the infinitude of omnipresence and local bodily finitude—the union of these in one person is inconceivable. It is only when we read the glory of God in the face of Christ, and realize that the central and essential attributes of God are love, grace, compassion for human frailty and need, that we can recognize the Divine and the human as one, and acknowledge in Christ the revelation of the Divine, the Word of God Incarnate.

3. Outside of the orthodox theology a freer development of thought took place, under the influences derived from the anti-Trinitarianism of the 16th cent., and the growth of modern philosophy. Socinianism was a growing power, and the influence of its criticisms passed into every land. The Socinians made a clean sweep of the old Trinitarian and Christological dogmas, and so cut the knot of the intellectual difficulties involved. In their view it was irrational and unscriptural to speak of God as being three. It was equally irrational to think of God generating a Son after the manner of corruptible animals, or to speak of two natures, each complete in itself, coming together and forming one person. The rational and Scriptural doctrine was that Christ was verus homo. Yet, having once made this fundamental position clear, the Socinians made many concessions in favour of Christ's uniqueness in respect of Divine supernatural endowment. He was born supernaturally of a virgin. He was equipped for His work on earth by ascending into heaven, and receiving there all needful supernatural knowledge. He also exercised supernatural powers on earth; and after His ascension He was exalted to the right hand of God, and was endowed with new Divine powers for the guidance of His Church. As thus exalted He might be called God, and Socious himself went so far as to justify the adoration of Christ. This Socinian doctrine rests on the same presupposition as the orthodoxy of the day, viz. that the supreme and essential characters of Deity are omnipotence, omniscience, unchangeableness; but by applying this conception logically to the Person of Christ, Social and applying the conception of Christ, Christology of all religious Socinians emptied their Christology of all religious value. For union with God is the need of the human heart; and the doctrine of the God-man, contradictory as it was, held a truth for which Socinianism found no expression.

4. The Arminian doctrine was a via media between the Socinian and the orthodox doctrine. The Arminian theologians adhered to the doctrine of the Trinity, but maintained that the Son, as begotten of the Father, was essentially subordinate, though still a Person within the Deity. They also maintained the full humanity of Jesus. Though one with the Son or Logos, He lived a truly human life; He had a human body and a human soul, and, according to Curcelleus, a human personality. The union with the Logos appeared in the communication to Jesus of Divine spiritual powers, but only of such as were possible to a creature. While they held His actual sinlessness, they denied His impeccability. Had they carried out their conception logically, they could scarcely have halted short of Socinianism.

Before the close of the century the Arminian Christology had multitudes of adherents, not only in Holland but also in Switzerland and England. In the latter country Deism had already begun to undermine the Trinitarian and Christological doctrines, and Arminian and even Arian views were widely spread within the Church. The whole tendency of the period was towards a more frankly humanitarian view of Christ's Person; and leading representatives of thought, like Milton, Locke, and Newton, whose sympathies were with the Christian faith, were estranged from the orthodox rendering of the Christian verities. The great variety of view, prevailing both in the Churches and beyond them, indicated the approaching dis-

8. In this as in other centuries, Mysticism pursued its own path, and afforded to some minds relief from the high and dry dogmatism of orthodoxy. Starting from the true thought of the affinity of God and man, the Mystics tended either to lose sight of the historical Jesus entirely, or to see in Him but one manifestation of the eternal Word. Jacob Böhme may be taken as their noblest representative. Böhme stood too near to the Christian faith to sublimate Christ, and see in Him nothing more than the type of a universal incarnation; but history and dogma are but the material of his all-mastering speculation. The Trinity represents for Böhme the thought that God has life and movement, that He is no abstract, changeless entity apart from the world, but a living God, working in and through all, the source and goal and spirit of all, the unity in which all contradictions are resolved. He interprets the dogma in a variety of ways. The Father is the abyss; the Son is the first forthgoing of desire in the form of will; the Spirit is the eternal out-breathing of that will. Or, the Father is the originating will, the Son is the power of love which the will generates in determining itself, and the Spirit is the will's eternal outgoing. Or again, the Father is the source of all powers, Himself the one all-inclusive power; the Son is the heart and kernel of all powers; and the Spirit is their living movement. But Röhme sees the Table But Böhme sees the Trinity every movement. where: in the soul of man (power, light, and the spirit of understanding), in plants (power, sap, peculiar virtue), nay, in all things that conceivably exist—even in the burning candle with its heat, light, and ascending air. In similar ways Böhme descants on the Person of Christ,—His double birth, in time and in eternity; His double body, the heavenly and the mortal. In spite of their incoherence, one may gather from Böhme's writings a suggestion here and there, but so far as definite ordered thought goes, his vagaries resemble the play of shadows on a wall. His meaning may be profoundly spiritual, but his language is a perverse interweaving of physics and chemistry with ethics and theology.

In no century was the rabies theologica more pronounced. The scholastic extravagance of the orthodox doctrine did not fail to work injuriously and sometimes disastrously on the religious life, while the intellectualism of the more critical circles did not directly serve the growth of religious piety. For the evidence of true and sincere devotion to Christ in this age we must look rather to the obscure and humble in the Churches, who found sustenance for their souls in a faith that surpassed all formulas, and which no scholasticism or criticism could rob of its transcendent power.

christ in modern thought.—1. The modern spirit.—(1) Its genesis.—The modern spirit manifests its characteristic modes of thought by contrast with the medieval age. It carries to their ultimate result the tendencies that produced the Reformation and the Revival of Letters. It has revealed itself in positive and distinctive form only in our own day and after a long process. A brief general statement of the course that process took will serve to indicate at once its legitimacy and the extent to which it was likely to affect ideas of Christ.

In essence and at the outset the gospel appeared as a revolutionary idealism, inverting the old standards of excellence and the old criteria of truth, yet not outwardly revolutionary in its immediate aims. Continuous with this instinct grew up the mediaval mind. It is a mind which sees its ideals with the vividness of reality and in the same instant confesses the no less insistent reality of the actual, and the impossibility of transforming it as yet by the ideal. It is a mind therefore of compromises and contrasts. Familiar as a summary of the mediaval spirit at its maturity are these: (a) the contrast between this world and the other world; (b) the contrast between faith and reason, philosophy and theology; (c) the contrast between the secular and the sacred—which three are all aspects of one fundamental antagonism, that, viz, between the natural and the supernatural. The practical consequences of these postulates everywhere penetrated the common life and thought. The l6th cent, awoke to the keenest consciousness of their baleful influence. What characterized that age was its fresh sense of the reality of this life and of nature, and of the interests of both. Baptized anew in mental and spiritual experience, its loftier minds were enabled to initiate those departures from the mediaval system which were destined to determine the most powerful currents of the modern spirit and which still rule modern thought. Modern thinkers frankly abandon the idea of irreconcilable difference between nature and the supernatural. They acknowledge no revealed thought that is beyond their judgment, and believe in nothing which is in its nature inexplicable or irrational. They work in a spirit and the natural, but the spiritual in the notern spirit differentiates itself from the mediaval by conceiving the distinction between nature and spiritus in the natural, is the formula alone adequate to represent the truth. The modern spirit differentiates itself from the mediaval by conceiving the distinction between nature and sp

(2) Its characteristic impulses.—Only by a slow and gradual logic has clear self-consciousness of aim been reached. Among the contributory causes four are of special importance: the rise of speculative philosophy; the scientific movement and the application of scientific method in historical and critical research; the growth of socialistic theory; revived interest in the psychological processes that enter into the construction of know-

In speculative thought the new point of view formulates itself in theoretic form under the name of the 'absolute' standpoint. Absolute here means that the universe is wholly knowable. The term does not exclude relativity; it only excludes an unknowable relativity divorced from all the phenomena of being and action. It points to two facts that must never be lost sight of, viz. that the Ultimate Beality is not abstract but the highest concrete, and that it can be reached by confidence in the power of Reason. The idealistic systems of Germany, in spite of their excesses, did magnificent service by their imperishable vindication of both truths. The scientific spirit observes patiently that it may define accurately. It is the spirit which takes nothing on trust, and seeks a reason for everything. It ranges knowledge in diverse spheres according as the facts it studies fall within the perceptions of sense, or manifest themselves in history, or are known in personal emotion and insight. Each science rests on its own proper principles, obtained from a study of its own facts, without reference to ideas drawn from other departments. Only thus is it possible to bring into clear relief the specialities and differentise of the various kinds of knowledge, and so establish the contribution of each to final truth. The scientific spirit has given birth to modern History and Criticism. Social theory embraces innumerable divergences of opinion, all of which have been influential in directing attention to the social situation and its effects on character. The Socialistic controversy has enormously deepened the feeling of human solidarity. Liberty, we are learning, does not depend on the absence of social pressure. Social power is the organ of personal character. The new psychology is the latest conspicuous intellectual movement of the time. It is the peculiar product of modern philosophy. Kant's achievement was to reassert the means of Person. It affect Krashoward that life is more than limit their range; to show that there are elements in the mind which underlie the very possibility of experience, and therefore cannot be derived from it; which elements are beyond the reach of Reason. In effect Kans showed that life is more than knowledge. That persuasion rules the modern world. The key to all problems lies in man; and the key to the nature of man lies not solely in his thought, but mainly in his will. The whole man is seen in man active. There is an enhanced idea of personality. That idea carries with it two others whose significance for religious reconstruction we cannot overestimate. There is (a) the ethical character of man's experience; his life is the fulfilment of relations with others; (b) the revealing power of his experience; to the whole man in action and passion the inner meaning of things comes nearest. Under the above mentioned impulses the modern mind has passed through the realms of nature, history, personal experience to a more complete mastery of knowledge. The effort has brought great gain to theology.

(3) Its influence on theological method. — Contemporary theological aims illustrate the direct effect of the foregoing forces in at least four directions: (a) towards a more scientific system of theology; (b) towards a better appreciation of the nature of religious experience; (c) towards insistence on moral personality as the determining principle in theological construction; (d) towards recognition of the 'social consciousness' as contributory to theological truth.

'Scientific 'applied to theology signifies a new method. The motive here is to vindicate for theology a sphere of knowledge of its own, precisely as for any other science; and to assert and defend the right of theology to employ a method peculiar to its own facts, appropriate to its own sphere. The vindication successful, it follows at once that both theology and natural science may pursue each its own independent path, limited only by its own law, yet both moving in real harmony. The rulgar conception of the supernatural, indeed, vanishes too; but simply because the richer idea has taken its place of an inherent Divine Spirit in nature and in man, both of which are moments within the Spirit of the Divine Being. The facts alluded to in the ethical and social constituents of theological truth reveal the partial character of the sources from which in the past doctrinal construction has drawn. They were chiefly two, the intellect of Greece, the polity of Rome. Greek philosophy and Roman jurisprudence, working on the Christian facts, yielded the orthodox formulas. The genius of Northern Europe had later to enter in and infect the conscience of the Church with its own deep feeling. The temper of the present age is its truit. It offers a wide contrast to the earlier age. It is an age less of intellect than of feeling: it is less objective, precise, actual, but more inward, refined, wistful. Ultimate explanations take with us a touch of what is subjective and personal. Personality is one of the dominant categories of the hour. It is just what may be locked for that theology should seek to interpret its problems in terms of personality. The new method is a radical departure from the old. It begins with religion as actually experienced in personal life, and from that reaches, so far as it can, the thought of God and hortratively given and passes on from that to religion. The new method can

2. Modern conceptions of Christ.—Modern conceptions of Christ vary according as one or another of the characteristic forces of the modern spirit predominates. We may range them in a threefold order: (1) the Christ of Speculation or the Ideal Christ, (2) the Christ of Experience or the Ethical Christ, (3) the Jesus of History or the Historical Christ.

(1) The Christ of Speculation. - Each of the transcendental philosophies involved a speculative Christology. The first phase appears in Eant (1724-1894). The work of Kant in religious Christology. (1724-1804). theory is the work of a pioneer. His equipment was not rich enough in mind or heart for more. Hume, as he tells us, 'awaked him out of his dogmatic shimber,' but only in philosophy. In religion he stood in line with the previous age. He shared the unhiatorical views of the 18th cent and its 'rational' religion. What of personal religion he knew, he knew intensely, as the class to which he belonged, the poorer citizen class, knows it; but, like that class also, with narrow It was a Christianity of heart and will, as practised among the common people, which was real to him. He stood quite outside Christianity in its occlesiastical or mystical forms. Religious experience of any independent type, except as a department of moral life, he was unconscious of. He had no consciousness of God distinct from the dictates of conscience. Hence, when he came to rationalize his religious experience, the outcome, as was natural, was the simple translation into forms of reflexion of an imperious moral sense. The Kantian position is usually termed Ethical Deism. The extreme deistic view is, that creation is left to itself save for occasional Divine interferences. Kant's central doctrine is in harmony asserting 'the absolute value of the ethical life God having originally created man and endowed him with reason and free will, nothing further is necessary on the Divine side for moral advance or redemption. Each man, as a moral personality, rests entirely on himself, on his own reason and freedom, and may make moral progress quite independently. His moral consciousness is con-ceived as so absolutely self-sufficient as to have no need of outward aid, whether from Nature, or Society, or God. On this general idea he con atracts his conception of Christianity and Christ in his treatise, Religion within the Bounds of mere R. ason (1793).

In the treatise, its ignores within the Bounds of more its ason (1793).

He starts with the perception of conscience of a reducal cert dwelling in human inture as an indubtable fact of experience. Opposition to Kant's interpretation of religion as mere ethics and of Christ as a Moral Example, Impelled more genial minds like Hamann, Herder, Incola, and others to reactionary insistence on the immediacy of the religious consciousness and the epeciality of the Christian revelation; but with neither critical nor philosophical depth. The direct succession from Kant appears in Fights (1762 - 1814), who was impressed with Kant's results, started from them as a disciple, and later ( carried them to further consistency, and in so doing advanced decisively beyond them.

With Fichte, Christ was the first to apprehend the Divine, the first to recognize clearly and embrace freely the Divine will, and hence is the firstbegotten of God. The manner of His apprehending was peculiar to Himself. The immediate unity of God and man in the spirit in which religion consists, came to Christ not by speculative philosophy or tradition as it does to us, but simply through This knowledge was to Him the His existence. primary and absolute thing, immediately identical with His self-conscioneness. In Him, therefore, it may be said that God became incarnate. Fichte labours under the delusion of conceiving personality as a limit of the Divine nature. That God in becoming man might not annihilate but enhance personality and raise it to its true infinite capacity, had to be discerned. The attempt came with Bchelling (1775-1854), whose philosophy is a philosophy of the Incarnation. His problem is determined for him by the conclusions of Fichts. According to the latter, the relation of the subject and object, human and Divine, is a unity of simple identity. But such an identity, it is to be noted, ignores the characteristic differentia of the human, i.s. that in the essence of the human which it is necessary to safeguard in its union with the Divine. The unity with which Christology is particularly concerned cannot be understood if the two members of the antagonism are not thought out purely by themselves according to their idea. The unity is not a true unity if the members of the antagonism are not united by that which distinguishes and opposes them. Those two considerations, the essential unity of the subject and object, and their unity in the midst of their differences, form Schelling's contribution to this high debate. gether they yield his doctrine of the Absolute.

their unity in the midst of their differences, form Schelling's contribution to this high debate. Together they yield his doctrine of the Absolute.

Whatever is nature and spirit, is within the Absolute It embraces all results. It is the necting print, the neutrum, the 'indifference point, of all bet and object, preserving the opposite alongside the negation for each per se. Moreover, it is living, concirete, being by ceaseless self-birth a mobile, willing, creative next and on that very ground necessarily a growth or historical process (Merden). In history the Absolute realizes used it could not become nanotest in testly, to marifest limit it subunits to instations. The mainfestation is not in any one form of finite instation but in the whole field of histor. The finite or the historical is that in which the Absolute has its life; the form in which the Absolute in the life; the form in which the Absolute has limited the Prince. The domain of that in the history is explainable by this time obstains the finites without it, the human holds the Prince. The domain of that it which it, the human holds the birther form in the mearmation of that Everything is explainable by this idea, food in His growth (Merden) or the Son of God. Nature points to Him, and has in Him its final causes. Entory infolds the aspects of His life; religion experiences Him as personal freedom from personal evil.

The mane idea is the consense of the Christian religion. Christ, in Hiel octorical Individuality is not the Son of God is collective humanity, and what is true of collective humanity, and what is true of collective humanity, and what is true of collective humanity and in one of the consensual size of the time armston is alwey revised when received as an isolated fact in time, it was from Him all seen since without an income without Him it could not have come to be or be known. He is the elevation is made a substance in the first objectifies the idea of the interpreted in a respirator in which Christ objectifies the idea of the interp ness of Christ, and to place Him at the head of the series. From another direction deepening experience led him to a richer appreciation of Christ's Person. The power of evil, he came to see, was too vast to be overcome by man alone; the redemption of the personal spirit is necessarily the work of God, and can be effected only by the immediate presence of God in human consciousness and knowledge. The more mightily evil had come forth in personal form, the more necessary was it that spirit should appear in human form as mediator—for 'only the personal can heal the personal.' God must become man. In Christ He did thus become man. In the Personality of Christ the Divine spirit is not simply signified, it is actualized. In Him the single personality is regarded as capable of taking up the perfect will of God into itself, and thereby of attaining absolute worth and becoming a true representative instead of a transitory husk of the Divine life. The infinite significance of personality is declared.

In Hegel (1770-1831) speculation reaches its culmination. Possessed of an imperial intellect, he succeeds in constructing a system (Absolute Idealism), with extraordinary skill and infinite detail, which co-ordinates and harmonizes into organic unity the various principles of his predecessors. His indebtedness to Kant and Schelling is real, and to the latter special. In the working out of the Hegelian scheme, logical considerations are determining. The process of human knowledge, with its alternate analysis and synthesis, is the type of the larger process of the universe. All progress is through distinction, and moves through the three steps of thesis, antithesis, and synthesis. A simple truth, once discovered, is affirmed as if it were the whole. Presently a larger experience forces man to the recognition of its apparent opposite, only to be succeeded later by the reconstitution of both in a higher later by the reconstitution of both in a higher later by the reconstitution of both in a higher later by the reconstitution of both in a higher later by the reconstitution. ciliation of both in a higher unity. Given this simple formula, Hegel will build you the universe. Given this ciliation of both in a higher unity. Given this simple formula, Hegel will build you the universe. Hegel admits with Schelling the absolute unity of all things and the identity of the subject and object. But while Schelling, in order to explain how everything is derived from this unity, takes his point of departure in the Absolute, Hegel starts from the Idea (German, Idee), and professes by the force of dialectic alone to make all things spring from the Idea. The Idea includes the Absolute (which is the pure idea considered in itself and in an abstract manner), Nature (which is the idea turning back on itself and beholding itself as soul, as society, as God). The whole course of history is the coming to consciousness of the Absolute as Spirit, an august process which culminates in religion. The world of concrete finite experience is not outside of God, but is a moment in His consciousness. History is not un-Divine, but is the manifestation of God, a process within His ornsciousness, and as such is the synthesis of finite and Infinite. Its highest form is the Christian religion.

In the eternal Idea there is but one Son, who exists in the first place simply for the 'thinking speculative consciousness,' but who, in order to be universally accessible, must also exist for the 'sensuous representative consciousness,' must be seen to sensible intuition as an historical event. The Idea must realize itself in fact if all men are to be made conscious of it and the unity of Divine and human it stands for. 'It must become an object in the world. It must appear, and that in the sensuous form appropriate to Spirit, which is the human '(Phil. of Religion, Eng. tr. p. 336). This is what has happened in Christianity. 'Christ has appeared; a Man who is God; God who is Man.' Christianity centres in the historic Christ. 'The manifestation of God in the flesh took place at a determinate time and in this particular individual.' In consequence of the Incarnation of God in Christ, man has learned the universal truth that it is eterna

It is unquestionable that the broad effect of such speculation was to evaporate the facts of Christianity, and to substitute a 'somewhat else' (ETEPOP εὐαγγέλιον) for the firm truths of a revealed religion. A God personal only in man, such as the Absolute, clearly implies that God is not personal. An ideal relation without personality has been likened to a painted horse which you cannot ride; and when the abstraction of the metaphysician interwoven in the universe is offered to us as the object of Christian belief, one who feels anything of the burdens and problems of life will turn away like Jacobi, little caring to know of a God who made the eye but sees not, the understanding but neither knows nor wills. An Incarnation which maintains a continuous manifestation of God, of which all men are the bearers, which is never complete, and which dismisses Christ's pre-existence, sinless birth, resurrection, Divine authority and sole mediation, is not only irreconcilable with Scripture statements, but wholly inadequate to the requirements of the Christian consciousness.

But whatever view be taken of the speculative movement as a whole, certain outstanding services to Christological theory cannot be denied it. It has revolutionized the study of Christ's Person, and in so doing reacted on the whole theological field. By constructing a theory in which the Infinite and the finite, the Divine and the human, are not exclusive of each other, it demonstrated the rationality of the Incarnation. By its discovery of the spiritual principle in Nature, History, Man, as the truth which gives them all their reality and unity, and by the identification of this principle with Incarnation, it showed the naturalness of Christ's Incarnation. By its insistence on the truth that the organon of religion is not different truth that the organon of religion is not different in kind from that of philosophy, it has, so to speak, rehabilitated the validity of religious facts, the treatment of which with the contemptuous indifference characteristic of the previous age becomes hereafter an unphilosophical dogmatism. It has vastly widened the range and deepened the bases of belief in the Incarnation, and made possible a fresh and thorough investigation, in the way of criticism and understanding, into the data which support that belief.

(2) The Christ of Experience. — The Christian facts and the Christian consciousness assert themselves in the experiential theology initiated by Schleiermacher (1768-1834). As Kant inherited the sturdy conscience of the Lutheran Reform in his 'categorical imperative,' so Schleiermacher embodies its religious fervour in his 'feeling of dependence,' or experience of God. When Kant describes the essence of religion as the recognition of all our duties as the commands of God, he says the same thing in balder language, in language less mystically attractive, than that of Schleier-macher when he asserts that the essence of the religious life is the sense of utter and all-round dependence on God. From his training among the devout brethren of Herrnhut, and by a natural temperament of warm susceptibility, Schleiermacher was more akin to Schelling than to Kant, who reiterates the essentiality of duty as Kant does, but of duty inspired by something higher than Kant dreamed of. What is this something higher? Schelling had termed it 'faith,' 'fidelity to yourself and God.'

self and God.'

'By religiosity—the inner power and spirit of religion—I understand not an instinct groping towards the Divine, and not mere emotional devoutness; for God, if He be God, must be the very heart of life, of all thinking and all action, and not a mere object of devout passion or of belief. That is no real knowledge of God where He is merely object; either God is not known at all, or He is at once subject and object of knowledge. He must be at once our very self, our heart of hearts, yet comprehending all other hearts.' 'Faith is to be understood in its original sense of a trust and confidence in the Divine.' Fundamentally this is Schleiermacher's view, when he bases his thought on 'experience' (Reden über die Religion).
Religion is the element of life whose influence penetrates all other parts of life. Religion is not a knowing; nor an action: it is a feeling. It is not as science, the knowledge of finite things in relation to each other. It is not as philosophy, the knowledge of the nature of the Supreme Cause. It is not as morals, which is rather the full exercise of its impulses in action. It contemplates the universe indeed, but not to discover the relations of its parts; rather to watch it reverently in the representations and acts characteristic of it, and to let itself be seized and filled in childlike passivity by its immediate in fluences. It is the immediate consciousness of the universal being. 'Thus to see and find in all that lives and moves, in all becoming and change, in all action and suffering, thus to have and know life itself only in immediate feeling as this being, this is religion.' Its seat is in the soul. The central quality of the soul or self-consciousness is a certain emotion engendered by the contact of the objective world with the individual; an emotion which is prior to both thought and action, and animates both. It is this emotion which, as the centre of existence and the meeting-point of the individual and the universe, constitutes the religious sphere of man. It is thus not the mystical sense of absorption in the Infinite. Mysticism has always supposed that the experience of God can be reached only by means which are independent of the world and the ordinary experiences of life; it takes the whole world of sensible objects and human interests to be a barrier between the soul and God; the way of perfection consists in escaping from all these until the impassioned soul in its upward flight loses itself in the formless and viewless light of God. Schleiermacher, on the contrary, teaches that the experience of God's real existence is not something apart from all the human interests of life. It can come through these interests only by deepening them. The roots that join man to God are the same as those that join men to one another and to Nature, only they go deeper. The religious experience, again, is marked by spontaneity. It is in every man with the original impress which his individuality gives it. Its range and variety are infinite. It may be known to us, shining, as it were, through the beauty and glory of the world in which we live. Sometimes in sorrow and suffering it comes as 'a deeper voice across the storm.' So, too, it may arise when the presence of something true or beautiful or good upilits us above ourselves. In short, everything visible and invisible, every part and event of experience, may become an appearance of God, and be a means of grace. Every experience may be a religious experience. A strong current of individuality is characteristic of religion. There is no such thing as an absolute religion. And there is no man without religion. Hence, too, the relation of the founder or teacher of any historic religion to that religion is intimate and necessary; the study of his characte

On the basis of these ideas Schleiermacher constructs his view of Christ and the Christian religion (Reden, and Der Christl. Glaube). Here the point of departure is Christian experience and the historic Jesus. For Schleiermacher there is not religion, but simply religions; the historical relationships of the religions he does not know. Every new Every new religion rests upon a new intuition of the universe. Jesus of Nazareth had such an intuition. What was it? The idea of Christianity is stated, in the fifth Rede, to be that the ruin of the finite in its alienation from God is removed: 'ruin and redemption are in this mode of feeling inseparably bound up with each other, and form the funda-mental relations by which its form is determined. Christianity makes 'religion itself the matter of religion.' Christ discerned in all things the Divine element. He discerned at the same time an irreligious principle everywhere. And the clearness with which He saw the need and the means of overcoming the unspiritual by the spiritual constitutes what is specific to Him and His faith. What is Divine in Him is not His purity or originality of character; but the 'splendid clearness with which the idea He had come to represent shaped itself in His soul, the idea that all that is finite needs the help of something higher to be connected with the Deity; and that for the man who is entangled in the finite and particular, salvation is to be sought only in redemption.' 'This consciousness of the uniqueness of His knowledge of God and being in God, and of its power to communicate itself and stir up religion, this was the consciousness of His mediatorship and Divinity.' To those who come to know Christ it does communicate itself with salutary energy, so that they become new creatures: He is the cause of the new life. In this relation He is the ideal type of humanity, and possessed a unique perfection. The proof lies in the existence of the Church, on the one hand, and the inexplicability of His religious consciousness by natural forces. He is perfect in what concerns His religious consciousness; here He was what He was by a primitive communication from God, in virtue of which also He was sinless. Otherwise He was truly man and subject in all respects to the laws of human growth. Divine in a sense, He was not veritably God; had no pre-temporal being, or miraculous birth, or bodily resurrection. He is Divine simply in the unique and perfect satisfaction He supplies to the needs of the believing conscience; and in the unique and perfect manner in which He Himself realized this satisfaction in His Person.

The culminating point of Schleiermacher's theory is the affirmation of the supernatural consciousness of Christ and the absolute value of His Person. In this regard his influence on subsequent theology has been of rare fruitfulness. From a multitude who own his inspiration, two may be selected as having, in an original manner, corrected and enlarged his principles: Rothe and Ritschl.

and enlarged his principles: Rothe and Ritschl.

Rothe (1799-1867) was probably the most eminent divine of the middle of last century. He maintained throughout his career, amid the strong intellectual and critical currents of that time, in all of which he shared, a personal faith of extreme warmth and tenderness in Christ's Person. 'Bear with you the living certainty of the reality of the historical fact Christ, and simply live your human life in the light of that certainty,' was the ruling motive of his inner life and also of his whole theological work (Theol. Ethik and Dogmatik).

logical work (Theol. Ethik and Dogmatik).

Rothe takes his start with Schleiermacher in the consciousness, the feeling of God which is found therein. In the presonality of man, this, the Divine principle, is at war with the lower or material principle, its contrary spirit. Not until the lower is vanquished is man free or truly himself. Its conquest is the moral task of mankind. The task can be discharged only in a moral progress of two stages, in which the whole nature of the material principle shall make itself felt and be transformed, and in which the whole nature of the spiritual principle shall display itself. The first stage involves the passage of man through sin. In the second, man will reach complete unity with God. The race of Adam is humanity in the first stage; Christ crownaft. In completing its task, He brings with Him a new power, a miraculous force, which serves as the point of departure for a new development of the race. Here the moral evolution is at the same time religious, since the more subordinate the insistence of sin, the more direct the emergence of the spirit of holiness of the new power, the more perfect, i.e., the assimilation to God. The appearance of Christ is due to a creative act. For although the world and man are made by God in an organic oneness, they are not so made that He cannot enter in. In Christ He does thus enter. In Christ He posits a new commencement of humanity; and in order to prepare for it Rothe admits a special revelation in miracle and inspiration. The new power, the advent of Christ, are by supernatural conception. The minastry of Christ was a continuous spiritualization and growing defication; in actualizing the constant conquest of sin, He at the same time unfolds the wealth of the life of God. The living substance of God comes forth in Him. The historical growth of Jesus is the divinization of man at the same time as it is the Incarnation of the Logos; its course is uninterrupted from His birth to the sacrifice of Calvary which marks its last step and its triu

Rothe's is a grandiose conception of Moral Incarnation exhibited with incomparable vigour of thought. Christ is no incarnation of the mythical sort, as in the imagination of India. Nor is He as one of the Heroic age, such as most primitive peoples magnify. He is man truly, yet less individual man than man generic; while at the same time God, the potency that rules the whole world-process. In its cosmical significance the Christian interpretation of Christ has never before received so impressive a statement.

Less original than Schleiermacher or Rothe, Ritschl (1822-1889), taking impulse from both, elaborates a system less speculative, more positive and Scriptural. His, like theirs, is a doctrine of redemption, and rests on experience. He construes his material, however, by a widely divergent method. The critical results of Tübingen had affrighted him with their divorce of the facts of Christ's life from the idea of His Person. metaphysical and emotional elements in the idea of Christ's Person current in the schools around repelled him. Ritschl had a singularly self-conscious and self-reliant character, and at the bar of the rich ethical experience yielded by the inner secrets of conscience his sense of the insufficiency of contemporary tendencies deepened. Injustice was done, he felt, to the historical and social and practical aspects of Christian truth. From that standpoint he directs a pungent criticism against the theological methods in vogue. They sought to construe Christianity by reference to the conception of God reached by a consideration of His relations to the finite world and human history and experience. Ritschl seeks the meaning of God as it is disclosed in the workings of the soul of Christ and in the activities of His earthly life. It was in that soul and in His earthly experience that the work of Christ in the salvation of men was achieved. Not in the heavens by transactions on man's behalf within the Trinity, as the orthodox schools taught; nor by His immanent operations in cosmic and human progress, as speculation dreamed; but in the moral personality and acts of the Redeemer. The process of redemption is not metaphysical or evolutionary, it is psychological. It was not to provide the prior conditions which should release the mercy of God, on the one hand; or, on the other, to overthrow an enemy encamped in man. Yet it was more than the announcement as by a prophet that God had forgiven or was ready to forgive. Both Anselm and Socinus failed Ritschl. According to his view, what is meant by God in Christ reconciling the world to Himself is that when God took human nature in Christ He actualized the forgiving presence of God. God in Him was in human nature, not on a visit, not arranging the conditions on which it could be redeemed, but actually redeeming and appro-priating it. Christ revealed the Father not by holding Him up to be seen, but by bearing Him in upon us, leavening us with Him practically and consciously. The field of Christ's work lay therefore in His own spiritual history, and among the conditions of spiritual human pature (of Ecosyth conditions of spiritual human nature (cf. Forsytli, Religion in Recent Art, Lect. 7). This is Ritschl's first important deflexion from Schleiermacher's procedure. The Christian consciousness or experience to which he appeals is found in the contemplation of the historic Jesus, as made known in the Gospel records. It is not to be regarded in isolated individualism, as was the case with Schleiermacher's appeal to the inner consciousness. It has in consequence an objective character alien from his method and from the subjectivism and sentimental piety often accompanying it. There is a second deflexion of not less importance. The Christian experience to which Ritschl appeals is realized socially and practically in the Kingdom of

'There must be added (to Schleiermacher's theory) the pregnant truth that this religion, like all religions and all spiritual activities, can only be rightly set forth in the fellowship which, on the presupposition of the redeeming work of the Founder, exists as the sharing and spreading of this redeeming activity. Redemption, the Redeemer, and the Redeemed Community stand for theological knowledge in an inseparable relation' (Just. and Recon. i. p. 495 f.).

Ritschl's doctrine of the Kingdom is specially worthy of study. The Kingdom of God in his view is at once (a) a moral ideal, (b) a social organization, (c) a religious good. The Kingdom and not the individual man is the object of the Divine electing love. To the Kingdom, the Fellowship of Faith, belongs redemption, which is appropriated by the believer only as a member of it. And he shares in it in the measure in which he discharges his obligations towards it; it is as he loves and serves his neighbour that he is justified of God. The reciprocal action and reaction of the community of believers engenders experience of Christ, by which men learn His worth for them. As the value of each is determined by his service to the whole, so is Christ's worth (equivalent in Ritschl's phrase to His nature in so far as it can be known to us) to be estimated by His work.

Ons uch principles, what, then, is the worth of Christ? Christ has the worth of God. He is a prophet sent from God, yet more than all the preceding prophets of the OT. He makes Himself known as, and is, the Son of God.

ceding prophets of the OT. He makes Himself known as, and is, the Son of God.

In the moral world all personal authority is conditioned upon the nature of one's vocation and upon the connexion between one's fitness for his special calling and his faithful exercise of it. Accordingly the permanent significance of Jesus Christ for His community is based, first, on the fact that He was the only one qualified for His special calling, the introduction of the Kingdom of God; that He devoted Himself to the exercise of this highest conceivable calling in the preaching of the truth and in loving action without break or deviation; and that, in particular, as a proof of His fidelity, He freely accepted in willing patience the wrongs which the leaders of the Israelitish nation and the fickleness of the people brought upon Him, and which were so many temptations to draw Him back from His calling. Second, the work of Jesus Christ in His calling or the final purpose of His life, viz., the Kingdom of God, is the very purpose of God in the world, and is thus recognized by Christ Himself. The solidaric unity between Christ and God, which Jesus accordingly claims for Himself, has reference to the whole extent of His activity in His calling, and consists in the reciprocal relation between the love of God and the obdience of Jesus in His calling. Now Jesus, being the first to realize in His own personal life the final purpose of the Kingdom of God, is therefore alone of His kind; for should any other fulfil the same task so perfectly as He, yet he would be unlike Him because dependent upon Him. Therefore, as the original type of humanity to be united into the Kingdom of God, He is the original object of the love of God, so that the love of God for the members of His Kingdom also is mediated only through Him. When, therefore, this Person, active in His peculiar calling, whose constant motive is recognizable as unselfable love to man, is valued at His whole worth, then we see in Jesus the whole revelation of God as love, grace, and f

In sum, Christ's Divinity is confessed when it is seen that His will was in perfect identification with the Divine purpose in things or the will of God; and that He displayed in the moral sphere the highest Divine attributes. He is the Son of God by His perfect knowledge of the Father's will and by His perfect obedience to it. After this manner He fully revealed the essence of God; and that in the activities of a human life; and in a sinless human life. The Divinity of Christ is thus not based, as is usually done, on the supernatural facts of pre-existence, virgin birth, miraculous works, and resurrection. These, however, are not denied; only, Ritschl would contend, the right appreciation of their truth comes after the moral witness, from

Ritschlian principles and results have been the subject of violent polemic. It is with their broad effect only that we are here concerned. What that is, is obvious. Ritschl has brought back men's thought to Christ as the centre of Christianity, to Christ's character as moral power, and to religion as the builder up of spiritual life by enlightening the conscience and educating the will. Religious truth can be verified by the moral sense. It is a question of fact; inner fact, no doubt, and not scientific, but truer than what is outward. But when the theological reasoner abandons the ground of fact and the safe circle of practical reason for the shifting mirages of speculation, then he uses words without meaning. Christian verity rests primarily on internal experience, and answers to the most urgent necessities of the moral life. It has, indeed, other relations and aspects that transcend experience and, consequently, our understanding. All that can be said there is, Exit in mysteria. Ritschlian modesty is often misunder atood. But it has served to clear the ground within the range of spiritual experience, and floods this ground with light. There is no true doctrine that can contradict this light, or shelter itself from

The influence of Ritschl is the predominant theo-logical force of the hour. It is felt wherever the attraction of religious problems is felt. He is best interpreted, not as the propounder of a 'theology without metaphysics,' or a 'religion without mysticism' (for he propounds neither), but as an exponent of the 'Christian conscionsness' of Schleiermacher. He closes so far the movement begun by the latter. That movement is familiar to religious thinkens in this country in the more sober theology of Coleridge, of Maurice, and of Erskine of Lin lathen, who may justly be termed the guides of the higher religious thinking in England in the first half of last century. Coloridge (1772-1834), adopting Kant's forms of thought and unbibling Schleiermacher's spirit, introduced the fruits of their teachings into England, where thought was dominated by Locke in philosophy and Paley in theology. The 'Reason' of Coleradge is the 'Practical Reason' of Kant, which grasps the higher principles. Like Schleiermacher, he falls back on experience as the test of sacred truth. He believes Christian truth because it 'finds' him. Coloridge shared in all the characteristics of the German school from whom he borrowed. He was no metaphysician. He was a great interpreter of spiritual facts, a student of spiritual life, a subject of spiritual experience. He saw in Christianity the true explanation of the facts of our spiritual being. He brought human nature near again to Christianity. He changed the conception of Christianity from being a traditional creed till it became a hving expression of spiritual consciousness. 'After him, says Mark Pattison, 'the evidence makers ceased as beneath the spell of some magician.' The line of thought marked out by the disjointed reflexions of Coloridge was continued by F. D. Maurice (1805-1872), who had been influenced also by Erskine, and still more by his own inner conflicts. His best energies were absorbed in the interpretation of religious thought from the standpoint of the Incarnation. By it alone, according to his view, could our nature be sufficient for perfect life. Quite in the style of the later Ritschl, he rests faith on historic fact, and finds the essential ground of human life in the Personality of Christ as the Revealer of the Divine will and character. Akin, in like manner, is his insight into the social aspects of Christian truth, the spring of his abounding personal philanthropy, and the inspiration of that movement which had for its chief tenet the social utilization of religion, the movement of Christian Socialism. More apart and less orthodox stood Thomas Erskins, who recalls his friend Fichte in Socialism. not a few touches of nature and conviction. was no student as Coleridge, nor of practical bent as Maurice. Meditative and introspective, he sought the truth by patient thoughtfulness and deduction from his own experience deeper thought, not larger knowledge. He brings out an aspect of the 'theology of consciousness' not emphasized Intherto, viz. that religious experience is a growing and endlessly growing inner perception.

The experiential movement has a second phase,

The experiential movement has a second phase, which calls for some mention in its bearing on present-day deas of Christ. It is a phase outside the Churches, although not always, or necessarily, hostile to them. It shows itself in the rise of ethical societies in America, France, Germany, Holland, and this country. Its aims are familiar to us in Britain from the writings of Matthew Arnald (1822-1888). Much theological liberalism moves in the same direction.

Arnald (1822-1888). Much theological liberalism moves in the same direction.

In the last forty years a succession of writers has maintained that while the noral and practical elements of Christianity are entirely consineudable and necessary, its theology is discredited, and must be abandoned. The aspirators of such writers are not to be confounded with those of writers still more radical, who denounce not only the theology, but the ethics as well, of the Christian Church, - writers including nen no widely parted from each other as Netzewhe the Parwinian and Rietershock the mystic. Of these societies it is relevant to our purpose to my that they cannot be viewed as within the line of progress. The Ethical Theology, and in particular the school of Rits hi, is sometimes at side by side with them. But without warrant. These societies, often divergent from one another, have a certain in it, and it is precisely to the principle of that unity that they separate themselves from the ethical movement in theology as well as from orthodox furistanity. The Person of Christ is all in all to these last. It is suching to those as bonds. They are immical not only to historical Christianity, but to the historical Christianity and in the historical Christianity and in historical Christianity and in the historical Christianity would be admitted that the more swalt high lands which the spirit is to outgrow. Furtured on the modern come lence they have not druck the deepest draught, that inner power of this, en unterly which awakens conscience and deepens it as nothing else. The spiritual sode of the Christian conscience in its sense of airs and evelation of this me pity and forgiveness, is unfell. It is here, too, that so mash 'Broad' or 'Liberal religious thought fails. There is a hierachism which, when extracted from the base which its upholders east around it is found to be, in its underlying postulates, totally inconstant with the historic faith. It seeks a purely spiritual Christ. And when it has found Him, He is neither truth

(3) The Cheut of Hudory - Concurrently with the foregoing movements has gone another, simpler indeed, and, since there are no truths which more readily gain assent or are more firmly retained than those of an historical order, more within the grasp of the popular mind, but also for that very reason more nearly touching the instincts of the popular faith—the historical and literary criticism of the Scriptures. It finds its sources and growth both within and without the ecclesiastical sphere. It is part of the general movement of science, the application of the methods of science, observation, hypothesis, and induction, to the facts of Hebrew and Christian history. It was not likely that the universal spirit of investigation and discovery should feel itself free to range over the whole field of secular history, and be restrained from operating in the departments of sacred. And so the Scrip tures have been taken, as scholarship had already been taking the classical books of the ancient world, as a literature of many fragments and times, and of varying authority. Their commands and teaching and records, all alike have been judged according to the occasion and circumstances in which they were given forth. In other words, they have been interpreted, not absolutely, but relatively. The Bible, as to its text, structure, the authorship of its several parts, and its literary and didactic form, is read and understood like all other ancient literature. Then, too, from the theological fluctuations of the 18th and 19th centuries, special impulses entered Religion, as Coloridge reminds us, consists of ideas and facts both; the Christian religion blends together inseparably the historical and the spiritual. The variations in religious and philosophical theory in consequence closely affect the character of historical study, and in an instance such as that of the Christian history, where the historical substance is large, with effects of the gravest kind. Further, the emergence of the hypothesis of evolution in acientific circles in the middle of last century, and its rapid acceptance and application to all kinds of knowledge, created a temper of naturalism, which reacted on Biblical criticism and Christological doctrines. Especially in the forms of Positivism (Comte) and of Agnosticism (Huxley and Spencer), this temper rejects every form of theism which asserts the personality of the Divine Being and the beneficent character of His relation to the world of men and things; and, professing itself ignorant of anything better, has lost all belief in any wisdom or love but that which springs from the brains and hearts of men. It is a theory which limits knowledge to experience, and experience to the physical senses—the sensations produced in us by the exsenses—the scussions paradox in the ternal world. It has its own view of history, and of Christian history as a natural evolution. The of Christian history, as a natural evolution. new historical sense, combined with the new interpretation of Christianity, in terms of the facts of man's existence and human experience, incited to a re-reading of the Biblical records and a resetting of their material data, which has to an extraordi-nary degree stimulated the interest of the general mind, and most powerfully influenced the growth of a purely humanitarian conception of the Person of Christ. 'History,' says Mommsen, 'has a nemesis for every sin.' For seventeen centuries the facts of Christ's life had been carelessly or investigately treated they was a series of the second control of the impatiently treated: they were now to take emphatic revenge.

The process begins with D. F. Strauss (1808–1874). Strauss runs his theory through the Gospels like a ploughshare through a field of daisies. His interest is of a purely negative character. He disintegrates the narratives and dissolves the facts in a series of writings, in which, with frankness and lucidity, he expounds what it has become common to call the point of view of modern science as to Christ's Person. His object throughout was polemical. It was to find a way out of supernaturalism. What-ever system furnished him with the means of attaining his object he eagerly embraced. In his first book he employs, on the basis of the wellknown Hegelian distinction between the idea and the fact, the notional and the historical, his mythical theory as a means of exit; in his last, Darwin

cal theory as a means of exit; in his last, Darwin and natural science come to his aid.

It is by his 'mythical theory' that Strauss is best known. 'Myth,' he says, 'is the creation of fact out of an idea.' The miraculous is a foreign element in the Gospel narratives of Christ which defies all historical treatment, and the conception of the myth is the means which we shall use in order to eliminate this element from our subject. The mythical principle is well expressed by de Wette: 'When any record relates inconceivable things in good faith, it is to be considered, not as historical, but as mythical.' Strauss lays it down as an absolute principle that miracles are impossible, so that every narrative which is in disaccordance with the laws of nature is pronounced to be mythical. The narratives connected with the birth of John the Baptist are poetical myths. That prophet having afterwards played a great part, and having been found in relation with Jesus, the Church judged it appropriate to glorify him in this way. The two genealogies of Jesus have nothing historical about them: they are the work of Judaising Christians, who believed that the Messiah must necessarily descend from David. The history of the birth, baptism, and temptation of Jesus are myths designed to establish His supernatural origin. Jesus was a disciple of John the Baptist, whose work at the outset He undoubtedly wished only to continue; but by degrees He came to believe Himself the Messiah, and hoped to found a political kingdom by supernatural means. Putting the moral laws above the Mosaic, He abolished the latter. He made missionary journeys. He did not perform miracles; but could heal demoniacs, and on that account all sorts of marvellous facts have been attributed to Him. He did not foretell His death or resurrection. He did not institute the Lord's Supper. The disciples, convinced that the Messiah could not remain in the tomb, had visions and hallucinations which showed Him to them risen again. Life did not exist in Christ in a perfect mann

The work of Strauss was continued with modifications peculiar to themselves by Bruno Bauer and others, and suggested the more serious labours of the Tübingen School, headed by F. C. Baur (1792-1860). The all-important problem was now

In four Epistles—in Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Galatians—we have, according to Baur, authentic Apostolic documents, genuine Epistles of Paul. They are our best authorities on every question touching the origin, nature, and principles of primitive Christianity. They reveal antitheses of thought, a l'fetrine and a Pauline party in the Church. The Petrine was the primitive Christian, made up of men who, while believing in Jesus as the Messiah, did not cease to be Jews. The Pauline was a reformed and Gentile Christianity, which aimed at universalizing the faith in Jesus by freeing it from the Jewish law and traditions. The universalism of Christianity, and therefore its historical importance and sohievements, are thus really the work of the Apostle Paul. His work he accomplished in the face of, and in spite of, the opposition of the older Apostles. The men who had been with Jesus did not understand Him; Paul did by natural ability. Not the unity but the differences and antagonisms of the Apostole Age are the key to all its problems, the point on which the constructive historian must stand if he would do his work. The memorials of the struggle and of the compromises by which it was ended lie in the canonical literature of primitive Christianity. They are best understood as Tendens-chriften. It is not easy to affirm what position Baur assigns to Christ. He is preoccupied with Paul. In a study on the meaning of the expression 'Son of Man,' he strives to reconstruct, by means of the historical data which the Gospels furnish us, the conclourses which Jesus had of Himself and His Messianic character, but the results at which he arrives are vague and contradictory. Sometimes he admits that the historian finds in Jesus certain characteristics which indicate that He possessed qualities unknown to other men; sometimes he affirms that it less the original Person of Christianity.

Christianity.

Baur's picture of the early Church and of Christ is now everywhere recognized as utterly incorrect in its chief and essential features. Why is this? Simply because he was under the domination of a rigid philosophical system which narrowed his outlook, and prevented him from seeing a multitude of historical facts of a different character from those upon which he based his reconstruction. The scholars who have done most to secure recognition for those new facts are Ritschl and The essence of the advance made by Renan. Ritschl lies simply in the denial that the evolution of early Christianity was a purely immanent process, and in the recognition of certain outside forces as determinative factors in the development. The cardinal factor assumed by him was the spirit of the Greeco-Roman world. According to his view, the rise of the Catholic Church, which means the substitution of institutionalism, ecclesiasticism, and sacerdotalism for the spiritual individualism of the earliest period, was due primarily to the influence of the Greeco-Roman spirit which came into the Church with the conversion of the Gentiles in the 1st cent., and which was thenceforth a controlling influence in its development ally in his spirit a group of younger historians have sought for still other outside factors, and greatly enlarged the historian's outlook.

E. Renan (1823–1892), trained for the Romanist priesthood, which he renounced, and attracted for a time by German Idealism without settling in it, encountered influences which were to enlighten the obscurity that his Catholic education and German initiation had left in his thought. His special work was done in the Semitic domain.

A visit to Palestine in 1800 offered the occasion for a Life of Jasus. In reading the Gospel in Galilee, he tells us, the personality of this great Founder had forcibly appealed to him; and the first sketch of the book was traced amidst the scenes of the Gospel history. It is no common book, the Vis de Jásus. It sketches a life of Christ which has won wide attention and acceptance. Jesus of Nazareth was a simple, contemplative, innocent, rustic saint, with a villager's childlike ideas of the kingdoms of the world and the glories of a court. These ideas He expresses in His parables about kings, says Reman, with the most delightful naïveté and want of connaisance des choes—but with a religious fire of love burning in His heart, a profound apprehension of God as His Father, and that ardour to bring others to the same love of Him which gives force and breadth to the least experienced windows. His whole estate revolted against the hard and fains encetiment of the Praisen. With regard to the Law, He had sugarly accupted the teaching, then widely descented among the Jers, of the school of Hills. But it would not be for even the widest interpreters of the Law, mays Reman, that Christ could have felt any great fractination. The Pulmin, Imshah, and more respect Hammark Literature had for many reasons a greater imaginative charms for His gentus. From the Book of Lameit He drew the Hammark Literature had for many reasons a greater imaginative charms for His gentus. From the Book of Lameit He drew the Mentanic title "Bon of Man which, with a fine appreciation of His even enquisitely human gentus, He remove ad queenly for Hismark Hermovier, the attempt in them books to shotch the lature course of history was the origin of Christ's own uniformed divares, and the outcree of nucch of Imaginative power over His consutration. Then there was the breedom of His life to Gallios. "That mountain rumment of Kannevth where we man of musher days can at without a troubled feeding about his destiny, there Jones ent twenty years without a double. Delivered from self-reching, the muran of our towaling, which makes or seek history for some interest in virtue beyond the tomb, He thought only of His work, of His nation, of the human race. Those misuration, that see, that anyre houven, those high tablelands on the horsoon, were for Him not the invitatively interfered with interest of the server. Renan's Life of Jesus is penetrated by a pro-found fooling of His human personality, its charm, its potence, its pre-emmence, its capability to create a faith. It has been shown to be inaccurate in details, and meagre and uncertain in its know-ledge, especially of the Jewish environment in which Jesus grew up. It displays an excess of precision in the psychology of illusion, a too ready emotion, and a want of gravitae. Yet withal the book did this service, that it introduced into the reading of Christ's life on its human side a greater conso of reality than modern criticisms had hitherto attained. For the action of ideas, as in Stranse and Baur, Renan substitutes the play of individual namou and character. The arid logic of the Germans is absent, and something of the wonder and beauty of the NT story is not wholly lost. It is here that the arrears in the 'scientific' or 'historical' Christ have most to be made up. The Apostolic conception of the Saviour, however uncritical and untrustworthy in details at the bar of modern history, embodies in that very super naturalism which is the bette soire of the scientific mind, a spirit so potent as to seem to those who gave the record the most striking reality in His-life. To reproduce that spirit in natural terms calls for a depth of feeling and width of experience which the critical movement so far has shown no signs of possessing. There hangs about its Christological creations such a rawness as to tempt one to the statement that it has not yet found the equipment adequate to its task. Christ must be interpreted from within. The interest of His life is in large measure independent of its historical framework, as the orthodox construction has rightly seen, and as criticism itself acknowledges when it starts from the teaching of Christ in preference to the events of His career. Higher instincts, therefore, than the merely intellectualist instincts of 'science' or 'history,' instincts akin to the poet's when he grasps the very spirit of poetry, or the artist's when his unique sensibility unveils a new revelation of beauty, are requisite if the mystery of Christ is not to be profuned. Hostility to the supernatural is an unscientific dogmatism. Equally unscientific is the explanation of it as 'myth' or 'vision.' The supernatural in Christ took such a hold on the minds of those who gave themselves to Him, as to render them readier than otherwise to reduce His human nature in its interests. The supernatural in Chris is that in Him to which the Church has at all times clung as the sustainer of her intensest faith and hope. It has enriched and not weakened the life of the spirit. What is the secret? How explain the tenneity with which the supernatural in Christ has fastened on the conscience of Christendom! Is it not that it has shown at all Christendom? Is it not that it has shown at all times power to embody men's highest religious hopes and aspirations, and has entisfied them? And should this not strongthen rather than lesses belief in its reality? Science has here a problem not to be evaded. In reaching a solution, the psychological trend science has recently taken cannot fail to furnish important data. A true 'philosophy of the unconscious' is a desideratum, have been desired many facts having an Already we have learned many facts having an intimate hearing on the old Christological problems. What they suggest is that within the depths of a single personality there may coexist parallel states of spirit-life; a consideration which, if vindicated, will make as passe before repeating the dogmas of negation which were framed with regard to simpler and narrower facts.

A sense of such necessity is apparent in the most recent phase of 'scientific' reconstruction of the Life of Christ. The articles of P. W. Schmiedal and others in the Encyclopedist Biblica, the Jesus of W. Bennest of Gottingen (tr Williams & Norgate), and the Jesus of Eres Bennam (tr. A. & C. Black), based on essentially rationalist principles, manifest an advance on the old rationalism. They seek the secret of Jesus in a psychological and advances. They are indeed in the professional and p land. They seek the secret of Jesus in a psychological uniqueness. They are indeed in line with previous radical tradition in rejecting the integrity of the Gospels as a reliable source of information, and in reducing to a minimum the available historical material at their basis, is regarding the major portion of the written record as artificial and adapted, of the nature of pious legend and idealizing postry, and in asserting the impossibility of considering the claims Christ made for Himself an adequate foundation for such a superstructure as the Church reared in the dogma of His Divinity; yet they are confident where earlier effort we often in doubt; they are also more reverent, genial, and expectant. A firm historical founda-tion is acknowledged, and that both in facts regarding His Person and particularly in His words and toaching. They are facts, too, which point to a 'sovereign self-consciousness,' worth to men more than kings and prophets had been, potent over present powers and offering promise of constant conquest (Bousset, Jesus, p. 96). 'He bound His disciples to His Person as never again one man has bound men. His uniqueness is not to be confounded with singularity, but denotes unequalled excellence in goodness and greatness. He constrains not physically but psychically; He overpowers us inwardly by his spirituality, His purity, truthfulness, and love. He is the Master of the inner life. 'We may also speak of Him as "the Radeemer." Not in the sense that His "the Redeemer." Not in the sense that His death was a propitiatory sacrifics without which the God of love would not have been able to forgive us our sins. Not in this sense: yet it was indeed His special work to redeem by guiding us from the letter to the spirit, from the feeling of a slave to the love of a child, from self-seeking to brotherly love, from the dominion of the visible to that of the invisible; and His death showed that He was ready and determined to offer in order to procure these benefits, not His labour only but also His life (Neumann, Jesus, c. 19). Not Divine, He is none the less not to be denied to the interest of the circuttion bear or extending the content of the circuttion bear or extending the circumstant of the circuttion bear or extending the circumstant of the circuttion bear or extending the circumstant of the circumstant o worship. The interest of the situation here created is vast. It is not only the new facts and the finer appreciation of them, but the plane in which they stand and the wide range of it. Scientific criticism has tapped a new source. Discussion of the philo-sophical implications involved in the wider range of facts discernible will lead thought to a new Idealism which, analyzing the 'transcendental' element in man more clearly, will the better and the more convincingly interpret the Divine in Christ.

In close association with the larger view of history and science in influencing religious ideas is the great democratic movement of the modern world. Our sense of growth in knowledge has world. Our sense of growth in knowledge has reacted upon our anticipations and hopes for the social state of men. It is only natural that the relation of Christ to the social problem should have come to occupy a foremost place, and that the traditional Christian ideas should be greatly affected by it. Almost every variety of socialist aspiration has made its appeal to Christ. It is remembered that He pronounced a special Beatitude on the poor, called to Himself the weary and heavy laden, offered a personal friendship to the publican and sinner, commanded His followers to be helpers of men's material needs; that He was Himself of the poor, and denounced in unmistak-able terms, if not the rich and capitalism, then their closest neighbour, Mammon. The situation in itself is of the deepest interest, but its Christological import is but slight. Christ's supernatural dignity is ignored. He is looked upon as nothing more than man, and even then as nothing more than a 'Social Reformer,' the 'people's man,' 'Jesus the demagogue,' an unmysterious human leader of the poor, claimed now for this school and now for that, poor, claimed now for this school and now for that, according to the partial and prejudiced predilections of His sponsors. To the great majority the Christ of the Creeds is an object of complete indifference, if not of dislike, while the Christ of the Churches, of worship, and of believing experience, is unknown or scorned. The transcendency of the Divine Life depicted in the Gospels finds no scho in their hearts. echo in their hearts.

It remains merely to remind ourselves that these three movements of Christological conception are all needful. They are not to be separated or considered antagonistic. They are complementary, helping each other to the new and richer belief in Christ. That belief will exhibit the ideal content of Christ's Person as the sum of all experience and all existence, seeing Him in all Nature, in all the forms of Nature, in all human Nature, in all the forms of Nature, in all human life, in the whole range of life's experience, as that in which they all alike find at once their living energy and their goal, the ground and the final end of the successively emerging and developing phenomena that we behold as Nature, History, Experience. It will not be like the older faith, a strange hybrid, compounded part of philosophy, part of history, part of moral effort; it will be the apprehension of a Person behind the facts and processes of all three, reached through facts and processes of all three, reached through the study of His working in them and the sense of kinship with and nearness to Him; who thus known will not be found to be summed up in them but rather sums them up in Himself, whose History no history has yet exhausted, whose Life not all the lives of men have outgrown.

CHRIST IN JEWISH LITERATURE.—In spite of the fact that Jewish literature covers the whole period from the time of Christ to the present day, and that the relations between Jews and Christians during that period have usually been far from friendly, the references to Christ in the writings of Jews are, comparatively speaking, few and unim-portant. What there are do not add anything to our knowledge of the history of the life of Christ. Such interest as they possess is due to their signifi-cance as indications of the way in which Jews were wont to think and speak amongst themselves of the Founder of Christianity. And it is safe to assert that in general they did not often occupy their thoughts with Him. Whatever may have been the reason, they very seldom mentioned Him; and they seem to have neither received any direct impression, nor inherited any tradition of His spiritual greatness. The few allusions to Him contained in the Talmud and the contemporary literature are, for the most part, contemptuous references to one who deceived Israel, and who owed his birth to the unfaithfulness of his mother. But they are a mere drop in the ocean of the Talmud, and do not warrant the assertion of a general and bitter hatred on the part of the Rabbis towards Him. In the mediaval literature the scattered hints of the Taimud were developed into the book called the Tôl'doth Jeshü, which is a mere lampoon, and in some parts a very disgusting one. But there is good ground for saying that this book was not countenanced by the best representatives of the Jewish religion, and did not express their opinion. It is on a level with such misrepresentations of the Roman Catholic and Protestant religions as find favour with the ignorant and bigoted of the opposite party, but are repudiated by the responsible leaders on either side. Instances are to be found in which leaders of Jewish thought in the Middle Ages have made reference to Christ in the language of have made reference to Unite in the language of civil courtesy, or even of appreciation. It is true that such allusions are mostly contained in speeches addressed to Christians on the occasion of public debates, and were, perhaps, influenced by the thought of the danger incurred by plain speaking. But there is evidence to show that in writings intended only for laws the writer could refer the standard refer the second of the content of the second of the content of the second of the secon tended only for Jews the writers could refer to Jesus without bitterness, and point out what they deemed to be His mistakes without blackening His character. In modern literature the chief Jewish historians write of Jesus as of a great historical personage; and though they, naturally, do not see in Him as much as Christians see, they honestly try to present historical truth and to avoid traditional prejudice. It is only in molern literature that there is to be found a serious and deliberate Jewish opinion about Jesus, a real contribution to the study of His life and character. The earlier references illustrate chiefly the effect of persecution and mutual hatred upon the Jewish mind.

In accordance with the brief sketch just given, it will be convenient to treat the subject chronologically under the three boads of (i.) the Tal-mudic Literature, (ii.) the Medieval Literature, (iii.)

i. Christ in the Talmudic Literature. - The period included under this head extends from the time of Christ Himself to the closing of the Baby-lonian Talmud, i.e. about five centuries. The literature comprises several works besides the Talmud, and falls chronologically into two main groups. The first group is that whose chief representative is the Mishna, the code of the Traditional Law completed by R. Judah the Holy, about A D 220. To this group also belong the Tourfta, a collection of traditions partly coinciding with the Mishna, and the Midrashim known as Siphre, Siphra, and Mechilta. The second group contains the Gemures, i.e. the commentaries on the Mishna made in the schools of Palestine and Babylonia respectively, and forming, together with the Mishna, the Jerusalem Talmud and the Babylonian Talmud. The Gemaras contain many traditions not included in the Mishina but contemporaneous with it; such a tradition is called a Baraitha. this same group belong the earlier parts of the Midrash Rabbah, Penkla, and Tanhuma, though the date of compilation of these is much later. The Rabbis whose works form the first group are called Tannaim, those of the second Amoraim; and it is usual to distinguish the two periods before and after the closing of the Mislina, as the Tannaite and the Amoraite periods respectively.

The question has often been raised whether there is any mention at all, in the Talmud, of the histori-cal Jesus of Nazareth. Until recently, Jewish writers have usually answered this in the negative. They have pointed out that the person supposed to be Jesus is described as a contemporary either of R. Joshua b. Perahiah or of R. Akiba, thus either a century before or a century after the beginning of the Christian era. This is true, but it only shows the anachronism of the tradition. For the person wo indicated is called variously Ben Stada, Ben Pandira, Jeshu, Jeshu ha-Nötzri (i.e. the Nazarene), Jeshu b. Pandira; and what is said of this person makes it impossible to doubt that the reference is to the historical Jesus. The following passages decide the question :

Path. South. 1076, 'Jeahn ha Nôtzri practised magic, and de-veived and led satray Ierael. Bab. Notzri had five discriptes.' Ton. If Mr. 11.22, 'Zu, Therr came in Jacob, a man of Chephar Sechanja, to cure him in the name of Jeshu b. Pandira.' Bab. Noné. 43d, 'On the eve of Passover they hing Jeshu ha-Nôtzri.'

It is not likely that there should have been a second Jesus the Nazarene, otherwise wholly unknown, who 'deceived and led satray Israel,' who was executed for doing so, who had disciples, and in whose name those disciples sought to heal the sick. It is now generally admitted by Jewish writers that the reference is to the historical Jesus. At the same time it is possible that the name Ben Stada did not originally refer to Jesus, although in the later tradition the two are identified.

The present writer has suggested elsewhere (Christianity is Tolinus and Historias 340 n) that the Stada denotes 'this Egyptian' who is mentioned in Ac 21<sup>28</sup>, Jos. Ant xx vii. 6, BJ ii xii 5. As to the meaning of the two names, Ren Stada and Ben Findria, various explanations have been preposed. Due none has, in either case, been generally accepted. The Talmud (Bab. Stadb. 104b) explains Stada as equivalent to Stath dri, such a one has been unfaithful,' and refers it to the alleged illegituate birth of Jesus. But this is certainly not the original meaning of the epithet. That Stads is made up of the latin words with nothing in its favour. Pandira has been explained as risbust, or varies, or varies, or varies, or but beyond some likehem of sound there is nothing to recommend these suggested equivalents. The riddle is as jet unoived.

Jesus, called ha-Nötzri, B. Stads, or B. Pandirs. was born out of wedlock (M. Jeb. iv. 13, cf. Bab. Shabb. 104b). His mother was called Miriam, and was a dresser of women's hair (Bab. Shab. ib. where 'Miriam megaddelah nashaia' is a play on 'Miriam Magdalaah,' i.e. Mary Magdalane). Her husband was Pappus b. Judah, and her paramour Pandira. She is said to have been the descendant of princes and rulers, and to have played the harlot with a carpenter (Bab. Sank. 106a) Jesus had been in Egypt, and had brought magic thence. He was a magician, and deceived and led astray Israel. He sinned and caused the multitude to sin (Bab. Sanh. 1076). He mocked at the words of the wise, and was excommunicated ob) He was tainted with heresy (ib. 103a). [He] called himself God, also the Son of Man, and said that he would go up to heaven Jerus, Taan, 656; Jesus is not mentioned by name, but there is no doubt that He is meant). He made himself live by the name of God (Bab. Sanh, 1964, also anonymous) He was tried in Lydda (Lud) as a deceiver and as a teacher of apostasy (Tos. Sanh. x. 11; Jerus. Sanh. 25c, d). Witnesses were concealed so as to hear his statements, and a lamp was lighted over him that his face might be seen (ib.). He was executed in Lydda, on the eve of Passover, which was also the eve of Sabbath; he was stoned, and hung, or crucified (ib. and Tos. Sash. ix. 7). Ah herald proclaimed, during forty days, that he was to be stoned, and invited evidence in his favour; but none was given (Bab. Nenh 43a). He (under the name of Balaam) was put to death by Pinhas the Robber (Pontins Pilatus), and at the time was thirty-three years old (Bab. Sanh. 106b). He was punished in Gehenna by means of boiling filth (Bab. Gitt. 56b, 57a). He was 'near to the kingdom' (Bab. Sanh. 43a). He had five disciples (ib.). Under the name of Balaam he was excluded from the world to come (M. Sanh. x. 2).

The several items of the foregoing tradition about Jesus are of various date. The Mishna does not contain the names Jeshu, B. Stada, or B. Pandira; so that it is not absolutely certain that Jesus is referred to in the Mishna at all. The Tosefta contains all three names, but not Jeshu ha-Notzri. Neither Siphrē, Siphra, nor Mechilta contains any allusion to Jesus. The main authorities, therefore, for such allusions in the Tannaite period, are Tosefta and the Baraithas embedded in the Gemaras. The Baraithas contain the statements that Jesus brought magic from Egypt, that he deceived and led astray Israel, that He was tried at Lydda and hung on the eve of Passover which was also the eve of Sabbath, that a herald proclaimed the approaching execution and invited evidence in his favour, and that he had five dis-ciples. The statements contained in Tosefta have been noted above.

The tradition concerning Jesus appears to have started with R. Eliezer b. Horkenos; at least it cannot be traced earlier. R. Eliezer was the chief disciple of R. Johanan b. Zaccai, who died about A.D. 80, and was living in Jerusalem at the time when Jesus was crucified. R. Eliezer was an old man in A.D. 109, and died probably in A.D. 117. Both he and his brother-in-law R. Gamaliel (grandson of the Gamaliel of Acts) had dealings with Christians. The tradition passed from R. Eliezer to R. Akiba and from him to R. Meir, in each case from teacher to disciple. The tradition represented by R. Gamaliel passed to his grandson R. Judah the Holy, who gathered in also the tradition of R. Akiba and R. Meir. This completes the Tannaite

In the Amoraite period the tradition is twofold, Palestinian and Babylonian. The former contains very little that is new. R. Johanan was a disciple of R. Judah before mentioned, and his disciple R. Abahu uttered the famous dictum: 'If a man say to thee "I am God," he is a liar,' etc. On the whole, the Palestinian Rabbis took very little interest in the tradition about Jesus.

The Babylonian tradition starts with Rab, who was a disciple of R. Judah; and though Rab himself did not add anything concerning Jesus, his disciple R. Hisda gave the explanation of the relation of Jesus to Stada and Pandira. It was he also who quoted the saying that 'Jeshu ha-Notzri burned his food in public, i.e. was tainted with heresy. A contemporary of R. Hisda and, like him, a disciple of Rab, R. Judah. b. Ezekiel handed on the tradition to R. Joseph, who corrected the explanation of the name Stada, and mentions 'Miriam Megaddelah,' evidently supposing that Mary of Magdala was the mother of Jesus. R. Papa, disciple of Abaji, who received the tradition from R. Joseph, added the remark about 'her who was descended from princes, etc. A few of the statements concerning Jesus in the Gemaras are anonymous, notably the story of His excommunication by His teacher R. Joshua b. Perahiah, and His punishment in Gehenna.

The Talmudic references to Jesus afford no ground for correcting the narrative of the Gospels. There is sufficient likeness between the general outlines of the Jewish and the Christian traditions to show that the same person is referred to; but it is very doubtful if the Jewish tradition rests upon a knowledge of the Gospels. It is hardly more than a careless memory, retained in unfriendly or in-different minds. There is also no warrant for arguing, from the Talmudic allusions, that Jesus actually lived a hundred years before the time usually accepted as the date of His birth. An equally good case might be made out for placing Him a century after that date. Rabbinical chronology is to be used only with great caution; and the statement that Jesus was the disciple of R. Joshua b. Perahiah (who did live about 100 B.C.), is made in the Talmud without the support of any authority. Moreover, the story, as referring to Jesus, appears only in the Babylonian Gemara; the Palestinian version does not give the name of the disciple who was excommunicated. There is nothing to show how Jesus came to be associated, in the tradition, with the famous Rabbi of a century before His time.

It is from the Talmudic allusions to Jesus that the mediæval caricature of Him was elaborated, which will be described in the following section. It is therefore important to note that the chief points in the Talmudic tradition which furnished the base for that caricature were His alleged illegitimate birth, and His character as a magician and a deceiver. The former is a coarse interpretation of the Christian assertion that Jesus was not the son of Joseph, while the latter is due to His reputation as a worker of miracles, and to the undoubted fact that He had created a serious dissension amongst the adherents of the Jewish religion.

ii. CHRIST IN MEDIÆVAL JEWISH LITERATURE. There are to be distinguished a popular and a serious treatment of the subject by Jewish writers in the Middle Ages. On the one hand, there is the book called the Tol'doth Jeshu, which relates the story of Jesus as of a vulgar impostor; on the other hand, there are references to Jesus by Jews of repute which are dignified and respectful in tone, and show a real desire to be fair towards the Founder of that Christian religion whose adherents had inflicted such injuries on Jews.

(a) The Tol'doth Jeshu.—In the printed editions this is a small book of some 24 pages, in which is told the story of the birth, public career, and death of Jesus, and the origin of the Christian Church. It makes no pretension to be a serious history, though it certainly does not deserve the torrent of abuse which its Christian editors have poured out upon it. It is merely a rather stupid and silly tale intended to tickle the ears of ignorant Jews, and to satisfy their contempt and hatred of the Christian religion by mockery of its Founder. To Christian readers it is, of course, highly offensive. But it should be remembered that the book was not written for Christians, and also that Christian treatment of Jews made such retaliation only natural.

What the origin of the book was is not certainly known. Traces of statements contained in it are found in the writings of Tertullian and Eusebius; but the first evidence of the existence of a distinct book of this character appears only in the 9th century. In the work de Judaicis supersitionibus, written about a.D. 830 by Agobard of Lyons, there is an extract from a written Life of Jesus, which has considerable likeness to the Töl'döth; and a similar writing, perhaps the same, is mentioned by Rabanus Maurus in 847. The Pugio Fides of Raymundus Martinus (13th cent.) contains the whole of the Töl'döth has as known to him. From this time onwards the Töl'döth has never wholly disappeared; but it was, naturally, never published by Jews, or even acknowledged by them. Christian writers who succeeded in finding a copy speak of it as being jealously secreted by Jews, and to be obtained only by bribery. Buxtorf in 1696 (Bibliotheca Rabbinica, p. 148) says: 'We procured a copy from a friend who bought it from "verpo quodam" for some Hungarian gold pieces.' The copies so obtained were written in Hebrew, but it would seem that the original language was German, or at all events the vernacular of the country where the book first appeared. The translation into Hebrew was presumably made in order to render the book accessible to all Jews.

In the case of a work which existed only in manuscript, it is What the origin of the book was is not certainly known. ll Jews. In the case of a work which existed only in manuscript, it is inevitable that there should be considerable differences in different copies. S. Krauss, who is the chief authority on the subject, enumerates 22 complete MSS and 6 fragments of the Tödöth, which he arranges in five groups, according to their points of resemblance. It seems likely that these were not all derived from a single original, but rather that the story, founded on the scanty notices in the Talmud, was told and circulated orally, and in course of time written down by several hands in different countries. With the exception of the fragments, no existing MS of the Tödöbh appears to be older than the 16th century. There are five printed editions, the best known being those of Wagensell (in Tela Ignea Satanæ, 1681) and Huldreich, 1705.

A short summary may suffice to indicate the contents of the book; and for this purpose the Wagenseil edition will be followed. Johanan, a Johanan, a pious youth in Jerusalem, is betrothed to Miriam, the daughter of a widow. Joseph Pandira, of the tribe of Judah, forms a plan to seduce Miriam, and effects his purpose on a Sabbath eve. Three months afterwards, Johanan, learning the condition of Miriam, consults R. Simeon b. Shetah, and accuses Joseph Pandira. Having, however, no proof, Johanan deserted Miriam and went to Babylonia. In course of time Miriam bears a son, who is Jesus. The boy is placed under the tuition of R. Elhanan, and by his conduct causes the Rabbis to suspect his birth. R. Simeon b. Shetah reveals the story, and Jesus is expelled from the community. He first went to Upper Galilee, and thence to Jerusalem, where he contrived to learn the secret of the Ineffable Name (of God). By the help of this he worked miracles, and proclaimed himself the Son of God, born of a virgin. The queen of Jerusalem, Helena, believed in him, by reason of the miracles. The leaders of the Jews, becoming alarmed, set up Judas, one of themselves, as an antagonist to Jesus. They allowed him to learn the Name, and arranged a trial of strength between him and Jesus. The latter was defeated, and condemned to death, but made his escape. Judas followed him, disguised as one of his disciples, and contrived to steal from him the Divine Name, which Jesus kept written on parchment and hidden in an incision in his flesh. Jesus, in order to obtain possession of it again, went once more to Jerusalem. There Judas betrayed him to the rulers. He was captured, scourged, stoned, and hung—upon the stalk of a cabbage, because no tree would consent to bear him. After he was dead, Judas stole the corpse and flung it in the ditch of his garden. The disciples, not finding the body, said that Jesus had risen from the dead. The queen believed this, and the Jews were again alarmed. The corpse, however, was discovered, alarmed. The corpse, however, was discovered, and dragged before the queen at the tail of a horse. The Christians were furious against the Jews. One of the latter, Simon Kepha, undertook to solve the problem by completely separating the Christians from the Jews. He learned the Name, worked miracles; and, having thus gained the confidence of the followers of Jesus, proclaimed to them, in his name, new laws of religion. They accepted his teaching. Thereupon he withdrew into a town built expecially for him where he accepted his teaching. Thereupon he withdrew into a town, built especially for him, where he remained, sitting upon a stone, until his death. After his death another Christian teacher arose in Rome, who annulled the laws given by Simon Kepha, and gave new ones, instituting baptism instead of circumcision, and the Sunday in place of the Sabbath. The new teacher, however, in trying to perform a miracle, was killed by a stone falling upon his head. 'So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord.

The other editions follow, more or less closely, the line sketched out above, though in detail there is considerable variety. All of them describe the seduction of Miriam by Joseph Pandira, some with a disgusting relish of obscenity. The remainder of the story is variously embellished with wonder-working and low comedy, and that word-play in There is not the which Jewish wit delighted. skill in any of the versions, or the least sign of literary skill in any of the versions, or the slightest indication that He of whom the story was told was a great or a good man. If, as Krauss is bold to affirm, the Tol'doth was intended seriously as a history of Jesus, it says little for the intelligence of its author and its readers. It is rather the wretched device by which ignorant and persecuted Jews revenged themselves, and found a pitiful amusement in mocking the Christ of their persecutors. It remains, an unseemly relic of evil days, but still claiming a place in mediæval literature; and if it bears witness against those who wrote it, it does so no less against those whose cruelty drove them to write it (see Krauss, Das Leben Jesu nach jüd. Quellen, 1902, for an exhaustive treatment of the whole subject).

(b) Polemical references to Christ.—We pass to a pleasanter region of literature, one where mention is made of Jesus in terms which, if not such as Christians would use, are very different from those of the Tol'doth.

The references to Jesus in the mediæval Jewish literature, apart from the  $T\bar{o}l'd\bar{o}th$ , are not numer-The reasons for this seem to be two: (1) that in controversy with Christians the Jews were not disposed to say more than they could help upon a subject where every word was likely to give offence and draw down persecution upon themselves; and (2) that the Jews were well aware of the difference between the Founder of Christianity and His followers. Their main quarrel was with the latter; and in their theological arguments they defended the unity of God, and denied the Trinity, upon Scripture grounds, with hardly any reference to the actual Jesus. To the Jews He was, of course, only a man. To the Christians He was God; and there was no common ground between them, or any occasion for debate as to His personal charac-ter and the events of His life. The controversy between Jews and Christians was fought in regard to principles, not persons, and was further em-bittered by mutual hatred. The Jews, if left to themselves, would never have mentioned Jesus at all, though armed at all points against Christians. Even in their own writings intended for Jewish readers, they say extremely little about Jesus, and in what they do say there is no attempt to estimate His character. For them He is simply 'that man,' or 'he who is known.'

The foregoing may be taken to represent the general attitude of the mediæval Rabbis towards Jesus; indeed, it is found in much later times. It may be described in the phrase 'cold neutrality' and it remained unaltered until the great Jewish historians of the last century made a serious study of Jesus as a figure in their national history. The attitude of Jews towards Christians began to change much earlier; but that does not come within the scope of this article.

The medieval Jewish references to Jesus may be illustrated from the report of a disputation, held at Paris on June 25, 1240, between R. Jehiel and a certain Nicolaus Donin (fragment published by Wagenseil in his Tela Ignea Satanæ, 1681). The Christian, who was a converted Jew, quoted the passages from the Talmud (described in § i. of this article) as evidence of Jewish blasphemy. The Jewish champion denied that these referred to the Jesus whom Christians worshipped:

'In truth, we have not spoken thus against the God of the Gentiles (i.e. Christ), but only against another Jesus, who mocked at the words of the wise, and did not believe in their words, but only in the written Law, as thou dost. And thou mayst know that this is true; for behold, it is not written "Jesus the Nazarene," but "Jesus Gereda." Moreover, if it had been he (i.e. Jesus the Nazarene), he not only did this, but also decrived and led astray Israel, and made himself God, and denied the essence (of religion). But, clearly, it was another man, who did not deny the written Law, but only the oral, and is called a min (heretic)' (p. 16 in Wagenseil). R. Jehlel also lays stress on the fact that the man of whom the Talmud speaks was a contemporary of R. Joshua b. Perahiah, while the Jesus of the Christians lived a century later (p. 21). He says that it is quite possible that both were called Jesus, 'just as there are many boys in France called Louis, who are not on that account kings of France.' Being solemnly adjured to declare his real thought on the matter, he says: 'As I live, and hope to return home in safety, we have not thought of him (i.e. Christ) that he should be "condemned to filth" (according to the Talmudic assertion), nor have we said these things concerning him' (p. 24).

A further illustration is found in the book entitled Juhasin, by R. Abraham Zacuth (b. 1504). This is a sort of dictionary of biography for the period of the Talmud, but containing also references to other periods. On p. 15 (ed. Filippowski, London, 1857) is the following notice of Jesus:

London, 1857) is the following notice of Jesus:

And the truth (is this) that the Nazarene was born in the fourth year of the reign of Jannain, i.e. Alexander (Jannaus); this is the year 263 from the building of the Temple, and the flist year of the Hasmonsans, and the year 3675 from the Creation (a.c. 85). Although the Nazarenes say that he was born in the time of Herod, the slave of the Hasmonsans, in the year 3760 (from the Creation), and that he was hung 35 years before the destruction (of the Temple), being 32 years old, to our shame and to declare to us that at once, speedily, 40 years in advance, the Temple was destroyed for the guilt of what we did to him. But this is not so; for his birth was 39 years before the birth which they affirm. And the truth is that he was born in the year 3675, and in the year 290 (of the Temple) he was arrested (i.e. a.c. 49), and he was 36 years old in the third year of Aristobulus, the son of Jannai. And for this reason the sages of Israel, in the controversy which they have had with the Nazarenes, have written that in the Talmud there is no mention of the Nazarenes there is a dispute amongst them as to the year in which he was born. There is a further reference in the same book, p. 36, where the writer deals with the assertion that Jesus was the contemporary of R. Akiba, his mother having been the wife of Pappus b. Jehudah (see above, in § 1). The writer decides against this, and says: 'According to the knowned the Eliezer; and thus it appears in ch. i. of Aboda Zara that R. Eliezer talked with Jacob, a disciple of Jeshu the Nazarene, fee man who is known was in the time of R. Eliezer; and thus it appears in ch. i. of Aboda Zara that R. Eliezer talked with Jacob, a disciple of Jeshu the Nazarene. A few lines farther down he quotes from Rashi the words, 'Ben Stada is the man who is known, the Nazarene'; but they are not found in the passage to which he refers, nor are they mentioned by Rabbinowicz.

It will be observed that the above passages deal

It will be observed that the above passages deal only with the chronology of Jesus, and this is, with a few exceptions, the sole point on which the mediæval Rabbis enlarge in their references to Him. The reason is, of course, their desire to ward off the charge made by the Christians, that the Talmud contains blasphemous allusions to Jesus. The following references, which all deal with chronology, may serve to illustrate this side of the subject:

R. Abraham b. David in the Sepher ha-Kabbalah, 1195 (Neubauer, Med. Jew. Chron. ii. 53), R. Jehudah ha-Levi (Cusari, ed. Buxtorf, p. 240). R. David Gans in Zemah David, 1592 (edition of 1785, pt. ii. p. 120). The last comes nearer to the Christian date. He says: 'Jesus the Nasarene was born in Bethlehem, a "parsah" and a half from Jerusalem, in the year 3761 from the Creation, i.e. the year 42 of Augustus Cassar. Abarbanel (Maj. Jeshua, p. 67*, cited by Eisenmenger, Endd. Judenthum, i. 239) maintains strongly the Talmudic date, and ends thus: 'And the wise men of that time bore witness concerning him his friends and companions' [i.e. the friends of R. Joshua b. Perahiah whose disciple Jesus was said to have beenly, 'and how shall we believe the substitution of (another for) him, from the mouth of men who did not know him, and were not there? . . And we will not depart from the truth and tradition of our fathers, who did not tamper with the fact, and who related the facts as they took place without addition or omission; and all this shows that this [the Christian] theory is murrue.'

The fullest and most elaborate statements of the chronological argument, from the Jewish side, are those of R. Salman Zebi (cited in Eisenmenger, i. 231) and R. Abraham Perizzol (contained in the same work, pp. 250-253).

There are, however, one or two mediæval Jewish works which deal with more than the chronological question. Wagenseil (in Tela Ignea Satanæ) published the Nizzahon (which he distinguishes as N. Vetus), composed by a writer in the 12th cent., as he supposes. Buxtorf, misled by the name, attributed the work to R. Lipman in the 15th cent., the author of another book bearing the same title, and also published by Wagenseil. The author of the older work was acquainted with the Gospels, and he ranged over the whole field of Jewish Christian controversy, refuting the Christians out of their own Scriptures. His arguments all tend to show that Jesus was not God; but it is worthy of note that he very seldom speaks disrespectfully of Jesus Himself. His quarrel is with the Christians, not with their Master.

Another work of a similar character is the Hizzuk Emunah (Munimen Fidei) of R. Isaac Troki, a Karaite, written about 1575 (printed by Wagenseil in the Tela Ignea Satanæ). The author shows an even wider acquaintance with the NT than the writer of the Nizzahon possessed; and he mentions the fact that he read the NT in the translation made by Budnseus in 1572. He lays stress on the fact that Jesus stood much nearer to Judaism than His followers did; that He never claimed the title of God; that He said, 'I am not come to destroy the law and the prophets'; that He enjoined the keeping of the Commandments on one who would obtain eternal life; that He gave many precepts which His followers disregarded. He does not hesitate to admit a saying of Jesus as true, though he immediately turns it against the Christians. All through the book his arguments are directed against what Christians asserted about Jesus, hardly at all against what Jesus said of Himself. And he may perhaps be claimed as a forerunner of the later Jewish historians who have really tried to be fair in writing of Jesus, who have at least abandoned the attitude of cold neutrality, and have scorned the wretched mockery of the Töl'döth.

It will have been observed that nothing has been said of the opinion of Maimonides about Jesus. In such of his works as the present writer has been able to consult he has found no allusion whatever. Dr. M. Friedländer, in his work on The Jesus Ateligion, p. 227, quotes from Maimonides, but without giving the exact reference, the following: 'Also Jesus the Nazarene, who imagined he would be the Messiah, and was killed through the court of Law, is alluded to in the Book of Daniel, as it is said, "And the sons of the transgressors among thy people will rise in order to establish a vision, and will stumble.' Can there be a greater stumbling than this?' This is interesting as being more than a mere chronological note.

On the whole, the attitude of the mediæval Rabbis towards Jesus was one of indifference. Apart from the necessity of controversy or the exposition of their own tenets, they had little inclination or occasion to mention Him. In Him, as a man, they had no interest. Their tradition taught them that He was one who had 'deceived and led astray Israel,' and they would not be at the pains to show that, although not God, He was still a good man. Controversy with Christians turned mainly on the questions of His Deity and His Messiahship, and the Rabbis fought the battle with texts, while they left the personality alone. It is probable that the great majority of the medi-eval Rabbis were utterly ignorant of what Jesus had said and done; they were concerned to defend themselves against the charge of blasphemy based on the Talmud, and for that purpose worked out the chronological argument. But only one or two seem to have had the courage to read the NT; and in studying their works, the present writer is inclined to believe that these Jewish controversialists had not altogether failed to perceive that Jesus was a great man. This may be a mistaken impression; it is at least a charitable one. We shall find in the modern historians a welcome change from the mediæval attitude towards Jesus; and to the consideration of those modern writers we must now proceed.

iii. CHRIST IN MODERN JEWISH LITERATURE. So far as the modern Jewish attitude towards Jesus differs from that of the mediæval writers, it is to be found in the works of the great historical scholars of the last century, and in a few utterances by liberal Jews at the present day. Apart from these, the influence of which, however, must tend to promote a truer view of Jesus amongst Jews, the mediæval attitude towards Him still widely prevails. New editions of the Tol'doth are still published, and find readers among the un-educated, in Russian Poland. And, as regards the educated, there is still the same cautious reserve which so far as possible avoids mention of Jesus. The late Professor Theodores of Man-chester, in a lecture on the Talmud, delivered in 1874, took elaborate pains to show that Jesus was not referred to at all in that work. And later still, Dr. M. Friedländer, in his book on The Jewish Religion, makes only the slightest reference to Jesus, and, so far as the present writer has observed, does not offer any opinion of his own upon the subject.

The first Jewish writer who fairly broke away from the traditional attitude towards Jesus was Grätz, in his Gesch. der Juden (vol. iii. 1856). He boldly declared (p. 224 n.) that in estimating Christianity the historian must take his stand on the historical, i.e. the critical, method. He made no apology for the shock which he must have given to the majority of Jews by his new departure. And he was not afraid to express high admira-tion for the character of Jesus as a man. He formed his views upon the subject mainly under the influence of Strauss and Baur, by whose help he was enabled to put aside as unhistorical most of the non-Jewish elements in the Gospel representations of Jesus, and to emphasize the strong affinity between His teaching and Judaism. Grätz claims that Jesus was, in the main, an Essene, as the Baptist also had been; that His whole purpose was that of a moral reformer, and that He had no intention of attacking Judaism, even the Pharisaic Judaism, as such, but only the depravity of those who professed it. The objections to this view are obvious; but the fact that Grätz presented a portrait of Jesus in which the Jewish lines were overdrawn and the rest nearly obliterated, does not lessen his merit as the first Jew who gave a real portrait of Jesus at all. Later Jewish writers have, on the whole, followed the lead of Grätz; some of the exaggerations of his work have been toned down, and more recognition has been given to the originality of Jesus; but the general outline of his work is still maintained, according to which Jesus was a high-minded and saintly Rabbi, whose fate it was to be maligned and persecuted, and whose enemies were His own professed fol-lowers quite as much as His Jewish contemporaries.

The work of Jost (Gesch. d. Judenthums u. s. Sekten, 1863) shows less of exaggeration than that of Grätz, and perhaps even more of personal veneration towards Jesus. Jost's chief contribution is his indignation against the 'judicial murder' of Jesus. There was no regular trial, such as Jewish law required. There was only a high-handed act of violence on the part of the chief priests.

He says: 'We hold it to be historical honesty, without regard to misinterpretation, to give to the fact its right name, in order to throw the responsibility upon those fanatics who did such a deed by their own power. It was not the Jews who crucified Jesus. Thousands of them revered in Jesus their teacher and friend. . . . It is time at last to judge without prejudice the authentic records of the Evangelists, who relate the course of events in simple words, albeit according to traditions of very unequal worth. Only the most blinded partisan can wish to justify the crucifixion of Jesus as it was effected, and to burden afresh the whole nation, or its law-abiding posterity, with the hateful deed of Caisphas and his associates.

J. H. Weiss (Gesch. d. jüd. Tradition, 1871, Hebrew) is interesting chiefly as showing how the radical influence of Grätz and Jost reacted upon the more conservative Jew. Weiss asserts the Essenism of Jesus (i. p. 232), and remarks that His deplorable fate was due not to His teaching, which was not new, but to the means which He took to promote it.

'For he claimed to be a prophet, and drew away many in Israel to believe in his Divine work and his miracles. And he said, before the multitude and even before his judges, that he was the Son of God. These three claims were the reason for all that was done against him.'

Weiss, beyond question, here puts his finger on the real Jewish grievance against Jesus—' He spake as one having authority, and not as their scribes.' Grätz and Jost had made it impossible for a Jewish historian to revert to the mediæval attitude towards Jesus; but one seems to hear, in Weiss, the echo of the ancient condemnation, 'He was a magician, and deceived and led astray Israel.'

The Jewish Encyclopedia may be taken as the authorized exponent of Jewish opinion, and in its authorized exponent of Jewish opinion, and in its 7th volume it contains a careful and critical article upon 'Jesus.' It is the work of three writers, Jacobs, Kohler, and Krauss; and is written with a full knowledge of recent Christian as well as Jewish scholarship. It is admitted that, while the teaching and practice of Jesus were in many respects Jewish and even Essene, He yet departed widely in other respects from Essenism, particularly in His association with publicans and sinners. His attitude towards the Law, insisting on the spirit rather than on the Halachic development of it, is represented as not necessarily or essentially it, is represented as not necessarily or essentially un-Jewish. He was, in fact, the representative of the Am-ha-aretz, the 'people that knoweth not the Law'—a rather acute remark. Weiss was right in pointing to His assumption of power and authority as the reason 'of much modern antipathy to Jesus, so far as it exists.' He did not, at least publicly, claim to be the Messiah; and His trial and execution were quite irregular. But, after all, it is freely admitted that 'a great historic movement, of the character and importance of Christianity, cannot have arisen without a great personality to call it into existence and give it shape and direction. Jesus of Nazareth had a mission from God; and he must have had the spiritual power and fitness to be chosen for it.' That is finely said, and it is with one exception the fullest Jewish recognition of the greatness of Jesus that is known to us. That exception is contained in an article by C. G. Montefiore (JQR, 1894, p. 381 ff.). He there speaks of Jesus as 'the most important Jew who ever lived, one who exercised a greater influence upon mankind and civilization than any other person, whether within the Jewish race or without it.' . . . 'A Jew whose life and character have been regarded by almost all the best and wisest people who have heard or read of his actions and his words, as the greatest religious exemplar for every age.' . . 'It may be asked, "Was Jesus an original teacher, and on what grounds does his originality depend?" Now there is no a priori reason why Jesus should not have been original. Jewish authors sometimes write as if there were an antecedent improbability in his having made any big religious or moral step in advance.' . . 'A religious teacher might, I suppose, be called original who combined and collected together the best elements of religion existing in his time, emphasized those most important and fruitful, developed them, drew out their implications, and rejected or ignored other elements which either did not harmonize with the first, or which, though he and his con-temporaries may have been unaware of it, belonged in reality to a lower level and an outgrown age. I am inclined to believe that herein to a great extent lay the originality of Jesus.' Mr. Montefiore's article shows how it is possible for a Jew to remain a whole-hearted Jew, while yet he feels a frank admiration and reverence towards With his full recognition of the spiritual grandeur of Jesus, the fullest that would seem to be possible without crossing the frontier of Judaism, we will close this study of Christ in the Jewish literature. (See, further, the histories of Grätz, Jost, and Weiss; Jewish Encyc. vol. vii., and JQR, 1894).

CHRIST IN MOHAMMEDAN LITERATURE. i. In the Koran. - The earliest mention of Jesus Christ in the Koran is in ch. 19, the Suratu Maryam, which was delivered in Mecca. It refers to His birth-to His birth—

'Make mention in the Book, of Mary, when she went apart from her family eastward, and took a veil to shroud herself from them, and we sent our spirit to her, and he took before her the form of a perfect man. She said: "I fly for refuge from these to the God of Mercy: if thou fearest Him." He said: "I am only a messenger of thy Lord, that I may bestow on thee a holy son." She said: "How shall I have a son, when man hath never touched me? and I am not unchaste?" He said: "So shall it be. Thy Lord hath said, Easy is this with me, and we will make him a sign to mankind and a mercy from me; for it is a thing decreed." And she conceived him and retired with him to a far-off place. And the throes came upon her by the trunk of a palm. She said: "Oh, would that I had died ere this, and been a thing forgotten, forgotten quite." And one cried to her from below her, "Grieve not thou." Then came she with the babe to her people, bearing him. They said: "O Mary, now hast thou done a strange thing, O sister of Aaron; Thy father was not a man of wickedness, nor unchaste thy mother." And she made a sign to them, pointing towards the babe. They said: "How shall we speak with him who is in the cradle, an infant?" It said: "Verily, I am the servant of God; He hath given me the Book, and He hath made me a Prophet." (vr. 18-4 28-39).

The child is represented as miraculously speaking

The child is represented as miraculously speaking in defence of His mother. He claimed to be the servant of God to whom a revelation—the Book—was made. It is said that this refers to the Injil, or Gospel, revealed to Him whilst yet in His mother's womb. The idea of speaking in the cradle is taken from the apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy. The idea of the palm tree is taken from a story in the History of the Nativity of Mary, when she rests under it on the way to Egypt.

In Suratu'z Zukhruf (ch. 43), also a Meccan Sura, we read-

'And when the son of Mary was set forth as an instance of Divine power, lo! thy people cried out for joy thereat. And they said: "Are our gods or is he the better?"... Jesus is no more than a servant whom we favoured and proposed as an instance of Divine power to the children of Israel. And he shall be a sign of the last hour '(vv. 57-51).

The idolaters of Mecca put the question recorded in the second of the above verses to Mohammed, when he condemned their gods. The Christians worship as a God, Jesus whom you praise: do you, therefore, condemn Him as you do our gods? We are quite willing to let our gods be treated as you

* The form in which the name 'Jesus' appears in the Koran is 'Isd ('8"3'), which appears to represent 'Esau' rather than is '786 ('8''), which appears to represent 'Esau' rather than 'leshua.' A similar variety is said to be found in Mandaic documents (Brandt, Die Mandäische Religion, 1889, p. 141); but this, like their Yahya for 'John,' may be due to Moslem influence. It seems unlikely, though not wholly impossible, that Mohammed may have confused the personalities of Esau and Christ; it is more probable that the Koranic form is due either to intentional alteration or to mishearing. Frankel (WZAM IV. 336) suggested that the initial y instead of the final was due to mishearing on Mohammed's part, whereas the other alterations were due to his desire to make the word rhyme with M365 (Moses); and this accounts for the facts (cf. Sycs, Biblische Eigennamen im Koran, 1903, p. 62). It is, however, equally likely that the alteration was due to Mohammed's informant, who may have been moved by some superstitious consideration. (WZKM iv. 836) suggested that the initial y instead of the final

This seems to be their line of argument, and it led to the emphatic declaration that whatever the Christians might think of Him, in the opinion of Mohammed He was 'no more than a servant.

All the other references to Jesus Christ occur in Medina Suras. We give the principal ones in their historical order.

In Suratu'l Baqarah (ch. 2) we read-

'And to Jesus, son of Mary, gave we clear proofs of his Mission, and strengthened him with the Holy Spirit'* (v.<sup>53</sup>).
'To Jesus, the son of Mary, we gave manifest signs, and strengthened him with the Holy Spirit' (v.<sup>554</sup>).

In the Suratu Ali Imran (ch. 3) there are several references

'Remember when the Angel said: "O Mary, Verily, God announceth to thee the Word from Him. His name shall be Messiah, the son of Mary, illustrious in this world and in the next, and one of those who have near access to God. And he shall speak to men alike when in the cradle and when grown up, and he shall be one of the just." She said: "How, O Lord! shall I have a son, when man hath not touched me?" He said: "Thus will God create what He will. When He decreeth a thing, He only saith Be, and it is." And He will teach him the Book and the Wisdom and the Law and the Evangel, and he shall be an apostle to the people of Israel' (vv. 40-43).

It is said that Mary was thirteen or tifteen years old when the announcement was made to her. The commentators say that Jesus was specially set apart to speak in the cradle, and later on to the Jews.

The phrase 'son of Mary' had become so fixed in Mohammed's mind that he puts it into the mouth of the Angel, even when he is addressing Mary herself. There are several interpretations of the words 'teach him the Book.' The most generally received one is that it refers to the Divine books of previous prophets other than the Law of Moses. There is a curious saying of Imam Mohammed bin Ali Baqir-

"Jesus was so intelligent that, when nine months old, his mother sent him to school. The master said the Bismillah—
"In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate"— which the child at once repeated after him. The Master then gave a number of words to be read, of which the first was abjad. Jesus wished to know why he should do this, upon which the master became angry and struck him. The child said: "If you know, explain; if you do not, listen. In abjad as stands for Allah la ilah ('there is no God but God'), b for Bahjat Ullah ('grace of God'), for Jalai Ullah ('glory of God'), d for Din Ullah ('religion of God')."

Mohammed says that Jesus was sent as an apostle to the Jews, in order to show that his Mission was limited, whilst that of Mohammed was for all people. In Medina, the idea of a Mission far beyond the confines of Arabia had now taken hold of Mohammed's mind, and he thus suggests by the reference to the limited Mission of Jesus his own superiority.

In v. of the above ch. 3 a miracle is also re-

""How have I come," he will say, " to you with a sign from your Lord; out of clay will I make for you, as it were, the figure of a bird; and I will breathe into it, and it shall become, by God's leave, a bird. And I will heal the blind and the leper, and, by God's leave, I will quicken the dead."

It is said that the bird was a bat which flew away whilst they looked at it, and, when out of sight, fell down dead. Traditions also state that signt, reil down dead. Traditions also state that he cured fifty thousand people in one day, and raised not only Lazarus, but also Shem, the son of Noah, from the dead. The story of the bird was evidently suggested to Mohammed by the account of the creation of twelve sparrows from mud, recorded in the apocryphal Gospel of Thomas the largelite. Israelite.

In the same Sura the death of Jesus is referred

'O Jesus! verily I will cause thee to die. I will take thee up to myself and deliver thee from those who believe not' (v. . . . The commentary Ma'alim says that he died for three hours and then went up to heaven: others say it was seven hours. Jalalain says that God took him away in a trance. Others interpret it in the sense of protection from adversaries, or the destruction of evil which would hinder the ascent to the world of spirits. The difficulty the commentators feel over this verse is that it clearly contradicts Sura 4<sup>135</sup> which distinctly denies that Jesus was put to death. In v. <sup>22</sup> Jesus is compared to Adam, that is, neither had a human father.

The next reference is in Suratu's Saff (ch. 61), and is intended to show that Jesus had foretold the advent of Mohammed-

'Remember when Jesus the son of Mary said, "O children of Israel! of a truth I am God's apostle to you to confirm the Law which was given before me, and to announce an apostle that shall come after me whose name shall be Ahmad" (v.7).

Mohammed here confounds the term 'Parakletos,' the Comforter promised by Jesus to His disciples, with the word 'Periklytos,' which has somewhat the same meaning as Ahmad, from the root of which his own name Mohammed ('praised') also is derived.

The next reference is in Suratu'l Hadid (ch. 57)—

'We gave him the Evangel," and we put into the hearts of those who followed him kindness and compassion.'

The next reference is in Suratu'n Nisa (ch. 4). It is a denial of the crucifixion of Jesus. The Jews are reproached for speaking against Mary, and—

'for their saying, "Verily we have slain the Messiah, Jesus the son of Mary, an apostle of God." Yet they slew him not, and they crucified him not, but they had only his likeness . . . they did not really slay him, but God took him up to Himself' (v. 156).

Mohammed here adopts the view of Basilides, an early heretic, who affirmed that the spirit who constituted Jesus the Son of God left Him before the crucifixion. He did it to prove that Jesus was not really a man, but only the semblance of one; and this is opposed to the Koran as well as to the Gospel. Mohammed apparently did not see the inconsistency of adopting the views of Basilides. Another verse denies the Divinity of Christ.

'The Messiah, Jesus son of Mary, is only an apostle of God, and His word which He conveyed into Mary, and a Spirit from Him. Believe, therefore, in God and His apostles, and say not "Three" (i.e. there is a Trinity). Forbear! it will be better for you. God is only one God. Far be it from His glory that He should have a son' (v.169).

In a later Sura, Suratu'l Maida (ch. 5), we read...

'Infidels now are they who say, "God is the Messiah, son of Mary" (v.78). 'When God shall say, "O Jesus, son of Mary, hast thou said unto mankind—Take me and my mother as two gods besides God?," he shall say, "Glory be unto thee, it is not for me to say that which I know to be not the truth"' (v.116).

Mohammed represents Christians as worshipping a Trinity consisting of the Father, the Son, and the Virgin Mary. The undue veneration paid to the Virgin Mary may have misled him in his earlier days, but he had opportunities of correcting his error; and yet in this the latest of the Suras he makes the charge. By this time his breach with the Christians was complete, he had no hope of winning them, nothing to gain from them, and so he either seeks to misrepresent their chief dogma, or, at least, takes no pains to ascertain what it really was.

In the same Sura we have a passage which has given rise to many traditions—

'Remember when the apostles said, "O Jesus, son of Mary, is thy Lord able to send down a furnished table to us out of heaven?" (v.112). 'Jesus, son of Mary, said: "O God our Lord! send down a table to us out of heaven, that it may become a recurring festival to us"'(v.114).

Mohammed may have had some idea of the Lord's Supper when he recited these words, or of the love-feasts which were 'recurring festivals'; but the commentators do not so interpret it. Some say it was a parable, and that a table did not actually come down; but most consider that a real table descended. Jesus made the ceremonial ablutions, recited the names of God, and then said the prescribed prayers. After this he uncovered the table and found, according to one account, many kinds of food; according to another, a fish ready cooked, without scales or prickly fins, dropping with fat, well seasoned, surrounded with all kinds of herbs, and leaves on which were olives, honey, cheese, and so on. Jesus restored the fish to life, then caused it to die again, and fed one thousand three hundred persons with it. Still the fish remained whole. The table then flew up into heaven. The miracle was repeated for forty days.

ii. The following traditions referring to Jesus Christ are found in the Qisasu'l Anbiya or Tales of the Prophets.

One day Mary in the house of her husband had arranged a purdah behind which she intended to bathe. Then Gabriel in the form of a beautiful young man appeared. Mary feared, and said: 'I seek protection of God from thee, if thou fearest.' Gabriel said: 'I am sent to thee from thy Lord that a beautiful child may be given to thee.' Mary said: 'Whence shall a child come to me, for no man has touched me, I am not an evil-doer.' Then Gabriel came near to Mary and breathed on her. Some say on her sleeve, others on her neck, some on her womb. Some say that this breath was a sneeze made by Adam and preserved by Gabriel.

Mary spoke of her conception to her cousin Joseph, who was to come into the house. He in sorrow expressed his doubts about her, and, on being told to speak his mind freely, said, 'There is no cultivation without seed, and no seed without a tree.' Mary said: 'If you say God at first made the trees, then they were produced without seed: if first He made seed, then seed came without a tree.' Joseph said: 'Is a child born without a tree.' Joseph said: 'Is a child born without a father?' Mary said: 'Yes, without parents, just as Adam and Eve were.' Joseph assented, and expressed regret for the doubts he had entertained. Then Mary told him about the good news Gabriel had brought.

They say that Jesus in the womb spoke with his

They say that Jesus in the womb spoke with his mother and said the Tasbih: Subhana' llah—'I extol the holiness of God.' When the days of her confinement drew near, Mary was told to go to Bethlehem, lest her people should injure the child. Mary and Joseph went, under the guidance of Gabriel. The pangs of child-birth coming on, she got off her riding animal and rested under a date tree. Then Christ was born. Immediately a spring appeared and angels bathed the child. It is said that Jesus said then to his mother, 'Do not sorrow, God has provided this fountain.' Then ripe dates fell at her feet, and she said: 'O Lord, Thou hast granted me sustenance.' The reply came, 'O Mary, thy heart turned to me, love for Jesus has come into it; be tranquil, sustenance will be provided, eat and drink and have joy in the Messiah.'

tenance will be provided, eat and drink and have joy in the Messiah.'

Then Mary said to Gabriel: 'If people ask how the child was born, what shall I reply?' He said: 'Say, "I have seen no man, I am fasting; I speak with none about it."' It is said that when the Jews found her and the child under the tree, they began to make a tumult and reproached her, saying, 'Neither thy father nor mother were eviloders.' She replied: 'I am fasting to-day,' whatever you want to know, ask the child.' They became very angry, and said: 'How shall we speak to the infant?' However, they asked him the circumstances of his birth. He said: 'I am the slave of God, appointed to be a prophet and a blessing in whatever place I may be, and He has ordered me to keep the fast and almsgiving as long as I live. I am not appointed a tyrant, but the peace of God is upon me from the day of my birth to the day of my death and resurrection to life again.' Having said this, he did not speak again till the natural time for an infant to speak arrived. Having witnessed the miracle, the Jews gave up their suspicion and reproach, and said that this was the prophet of whose birth the preceding prophets had spoken.

Then Mary went to Jerusalem, where, seeing the rien Mary went to Jerusalem, where, seeing the miracles done by the child, people sought to destroy him. Then, by the order of God, Mary took him to Egypt. Some say she went with Joseph and the child to Damascus, to the house of a rich man, who protected and provided for them. He nourished many lame and blind persons. At this time a year we hable article of his was stelen this time a very valuable article of his was stolen, and no trace of the thief could be found. Jesus and to trace of the timer could be round. Seeks said: 'Such a lame and such a blind man stole the thing.' When accused, the blind man said: 'How could I see to steal?,' and the lame man, 'How could I walk to do so?' Jesus said: 'The blind man carried the lame man, who then from shelf took the goods and divided the booty. So the theft was found out.

Then Jesus, having received from God the gift of prophecy, returned to Jerusalem and invited the Jews to embrace the strong religion; but they were displeased, and only his apostles followed

It is said that the term hawari, " 'apostle,' comes from a word meaning 'to whiten,' and that the apostles were so called because they were fullers by trade. Jesus said to them: 'Just as you make clothes clean, so by faith in God cleanse your hearts from the dust of sin.' Then they asked for a miracle. Jesus took various clothes and filled a jar with them. Some time after he took them out, when they were all of one colour. These twelve men then believed in him. God told These twelve men then believed in him. God told Jesus to tell people first, that 'God is one without a partner,' then to tell them of the coming of Mohammed as a prophet, and say: 'A prophet will come after me, Ahmad by name.' Then Jesus, wearing a woollen cloth, with staff in hand went here and there. At night he used a stone for a pillow and lay on the ground. His food was barley bread and greens. He cared nothing for worldly wealth. He never desired the society and friendship of women. His life was one of great friendship of women. His life was one of great simplicity. Seeing his fatigue in walking, his disciples brought him an animal to ride; but after using it once he returned it to them, for the animal of providing it with feel to them, for the anxiety of providing it with fodder was more than he could bear. They then wished to procure him a house; he declined it on the ground that if he lived long it would go to ruin; if he soon died, some one else would get it.

One day he saw an old man sitting by the grave of his son. Jesus, after two prostrations in prayer, said: 'O certain one, rise by the order of God. The grave opened, and the corpse came forth and said: 'O Lord, why didst thou call me?' The Jews said: 'We have never seen such a sorcerer.'
It is related that God ordered Jesus to go to the king of Nasibin, a proud and infidel ruler. Jesus went with his twelve disciples, and on arriving near the place said: 'Who of you will go and announce to the people of this place my arrival?' James and Thomas and Simon Peter went. When near the place, Simon told the other two to go on and give the news, and he would wait; so that if evil should fall on one of them he might make some plan. Then James and Thomas entered the city, plan. Then James and Thomas entered the city, and cried out, 'Jesus the Prophet of God and the Spirit of God has come to the city.' The people seized Thomas and took him to the king, who said: 'Who has spoken here of a prophet, and God, and the Spirit of God! if he does not repent, I will kill him.' Thomas said: 'I will not repent. Let the king do as he wills.' Then by the order of the king the people cut off the hands and feet of Thomas, and left him in an unclean place. of Thomas, and left him in an unclean place. Simon then came and sought the audience of the king, and begged to be allowed to interrogate Thomas. He then asked him how he supported the statement he had made. Thomas replied that Jesus worked miracles, for the blind and lame and sick were healed. Simon said: 'Doctors do this; what other proof have you?' 'Jesus knows what people eat, and drink, and say in their houses.' Simon said: 'This too can be done by intelligence and hearing: give another proof.' 'He telligence and hearing: give another proof.' 'He makes birds of mud, and makes them fly.' Simon said: 'This is simply magic: give another proof.'

Thomas said: 'He raises by the order of God the dead to life.' Simon then said to the king: 'If this is so, it is advisable that your honour should send for Jesus, and see whether what Thomas says is right: if he raises the dead he is a true prophet.' The king approved, and sent for Jesus, to whom Simon told all that had passed. Jesus asked what miracles were called for. Simon said to heal the hands and feet of Thomas; then to state what each one in the assembly had eaten, and what stores he had; then to make mud birds fly. Jesus did all these things. Salman al-Farisi says that when all the sick in Nasibin were healed, the people asked Jesus to raise the dead. Jesus said he would do so. They came to the grave of Shem, son of Noah, and said, 'Revive him.' Jesus made two prostrations in prayer and prayed to God. Then by order of God the earth opened, and a person with white hair and beard came said to the people: 'Certainly, Jesus is a prophet of God. All of you should believe in him and obey him.' Then Jesus said to Shem: 'In your obey him. Then Jesus said to Shem: 'In your lifetime no one had white hair; how is it yours is white?' He replied: 'When I heard your voice, I thought the day of judgment had come, and my hair turned white with fear.' Jesus said: 'How long have you been dead?' He replied: 'Four thousand years.' Jesus wished to pray for his life, but Shem said: 'Again I must die, I have no wish to live on, if you will ask God to have mercy on me.

One day when a crowd was following Jesus, they said they were hungry. The Apostles urged him to relieve them. This relief came in the form of a tray of God from heaven. When Jesus and the Apostles saw it, they offered thanks to God. Then Jesus said: 'Let the most pious one amongst you lift up the cover of the tray.' The Apostles requested him to do it. He did so, and then they saw on the tray a fish without bones from which oil was flowing, and round it were all kinds of vegetables, but there was no garlic or leeks. Near the head of the fish was some vinegar, and near the tail some salt. Round it were bleed five leeves and on such leef were to fee placed five loaves, and on each loaf were a few olives, five pomegranates, and five dates. Simon, Jesus told the people to eat. The Apostles said: 'You eat and then we will.' Jesus said: 'I do not eat. Let the people for whom I obtained it eat.'
Then the people ate. The sick, after eating this food, were restored to health. Multitudes ate, but the food was not less. It is said that for forty days this tray came down each morning and remained till mid-day. Then the word came to Jesus: 'Only the poor, the orphans, and the sick should eat.' The rich murmured, and God threatened them with punishment. Some said: 'Make the fish alive again, and we will believe.' Jesus did so; but they believed not, and seventy men

A man came to Mary one day, and said: 'The king has said that a ryot each day is to make a feast for him and his army. To-day it is my turn, and I have not the means to do it.' Mary turned for aid to Jesus, who hesitated; but Mary said that aid would be a great favour to the ryot. Jesus then sent for the master of the house, and said: 'Cot ready jars and rote and fell writh said: 'Get ready jars and pots, and fill up with water,' which Jesus changed into pure wine. In other pots cooked meat was found, and newly baked bread on trays appeared. The king wished to know where the wine came from. The man to know where the wine came from. The king, replied, From such and such a place. The king, knowing the wine of that place, said: 'Why dost the man confessed that a neighbour had by his prayers provided all. The king then called for Jesus, and said: 'The heir to my throne died a little while ago, restore him to life.' Jesus said that his return to life meant many evils to the country. The king said: 'Let the country be country. The king said: 'Let the country be ruined if I only get one glimpse of him.' Jesus said: 'If I raise him, will you let me go in peace?' The king agreed; so the prince came to life, and Jesus went away. But the prince was a tyrant, and the people killed both father and son.

One day Jesus met a Jew with two loaves. The Jew agreed to share food; but when he saw Jesus had only one loaf, he hid one of his, and next had only one loaf, he hid one of his, and next morning appeared with one only, and denied that he had more. Then Jesus, when going on the way, asked a shepherd to feed him, who said: 'Tell one of my men to slay a sheep that it may be cooked.' Jesus from the skin and bones revived the sheep. 'Who art thou?' said the shepherd. 'Jesus, son of Mary.' Then Jesus asked the Jew where the two loaves were. He swore he had only one. Jesus remained quiet. At the next stage he had a calf killed, and they all ate of it, and again he restored the calf to life and gave it back to its owner, and again asked the Jew where the two owner, and again asked the Jew where the two loaves were. He again denied that he had two. loaves were. He again denied that he had two. They then come to a city where the king was sick and at the point of death. Then the Jew told the nobles that he could cure all diseases and even raise the dead. They said: 'Cure the king and we will give you much money.' He began to beat the king with his staff, and the king died. The nobles ordered that he should be hanged. Jesus, seeing this, said: 'If I raise your king, will you forgive my friend?' Jesus raised the king and released the Jew. The Jew was profuse in his thanks. Jesus said: 'Where is the second loaf?' The Jew said he had only one. The Jew said he had only one.

Jesus went one day to an infidel king like Pharaoh, and called upon him to embrace Islam. The king, being annoyed, determined to kill him. Jesus hid in a mountain cave, and after a few days told his disciples that this revelation had come: told his disciples that this reversion had come. 'Truly I will raise thee up and bring thee back to myself.' The Apostles wept at the idea of separation from him. He said: 'You weep now, when the enemy comes you will forsake me.' They the enemy comes you will forsake me. They declared that they would allow no enemy to come near him, and would protect him. They also said: 'Will another prophet come after thee?' He said: 'Yes, of the Quraish tribe, an unlettered prophet, Mohammed superior to me, will come. Tell the Mohammed, superior to me, will come. Tell the generations to come to follow him. He then added: 'Now I make He will be agreed. He green, all of you obe said: 'After my death trays full of light will come, and by the blessing of that light you will know the languages of all tribes.'

Some say that the Jews, by the advice of that bad king, and by means of an old Apostle, seized Jesus and imprisoned him all night, and in the morning prepared a cross on which to crucify him. Then great darkness fell, and angels released Jesus from prison and carried him up on high, and took the old man prisoner. The Jews, thinking he was Jesus, quickly killed him, and he was crucified, though he protested that he was not Jesus, but the man who had betrayed him. The Jews did not believe it. All historians say Mary was then alive. Others say the Jews watched and guarded the cave where Jesus was, but Jesus at night was taken up under cover of darkness. In the morning the Jews sent a man to find Jesus, but he returned and said that no one was there. Then the Jews said: 'Thou art Jesus,' and crucified

Others say the Jews imprisoned him with eighteen men in a house. Jesus said: 'If one of you will assume my appearance, God will reward you in Paradise.' One agreed. Jesus ascended on high. In the morning the Jesus said, 'There were eighteen men with Jesus; one is short.' The prisoners said Jesus had gone on high; but the Jews saw one like Jesus and crucified him. After a few days Jesus returned to the Apostles; then he died, but God restored him to life and made him like an angel.

It is said that at the last day, when Dajjal the cursed, with Imam Mahdi, collects the people at morning prayers, Jesus will appear on the Mosque morning prayers, Jesus will appear on the Mosque at Jerusalem, and will descend to join Imam Mahdi, and kill Dajjal. He will engage in Jihad, or wars of religion, and bring people to Islam. Such will be his justice that the lion and the sheep will dwell together, and children will play with serpents. When Jesus dies again, the burial prayers (namaz-i-Janazah) will be said over him, and he will be buried in the tomb of Mohammed at Madine Medina.

LITERATURE.—The Christology of the Koran is the subject of a considerable literature, which is best represented in recent times by Ed. Sayous, Jésus-Christ d'après Mahomet, Paris, 1880. Somewhat earlier are Gerock, Versuch einer Darstellung der Christologie des Korans, Hamburg and Gotha, 1839; and Manneval, La Christologie du Koran, Toulouse, 1867. See also H. Preserved Smith, The Bible and Islam, New York, 1897; and the missionary tract 'Islam and Christianity,' American Tract Society, 1891. Society, 1891.

In the post-Koranic literature of Islam three classes of writers are occupied with the Person of Christ, for different purposes.

1. The theologians.—These persons, so far as they argue with Christians, are compelled to discredit the Christian Gospels, against which they urge objections often identical with those popularised in recent times by Strauss. The remarkable treatise by Ibn Hasm (d. 1063 a.D.), published in Cairo, 1903-4, represents the extreme of negative criticism. The author refuses to trust the Gospels even for the names of the Apostles; nothing whatever, he holds, is known about Isā beyond the statements of the Koran. For the mode in which his arguments can be met we may refer to St. Clair Tisdall, Muhammadan Objections to Christianity, 1904. Ibn Hazm's view is not generally popular among Moslems; and some, such as Fakhr al-din al-Ragi (d. 1209), a commentator of high repute, even use the Gospels to illustrate the Koran. This practice is imitated by the Egyptian mufti, Mohammed Abdo, from whom Islam expected so much, in the commentaries which are published in the Cairene bi-monthly Manār. It is not unusual to find illustrations of the Koran from the Gospels in commentaries by authors who would not consult them; in such cases they are given after a chain of authorities going back to one of the companions of the Prophet.

2. The preachers.—The Moslem sermon ordinarily consists In the post-Koranic literature of Islam three classes of writers Prophet.

2. The preachers.—The Moslem sermon ordinarily consists largely of anecdotes or maxims connected with persons of eminence. These include prophets; Greek, Roman, and Persian sages; companions of the Prophet; and Moslem saints. In the works of these writers the name of Isâ figures very frequently, the sayings and doings assigned to Him being sometimes traceable to the Gospels, but often assigned in different works to a variety of persons. A great quantity bearing the name Isâ are to be found in the great homiletic encyclopedia called 'Revival of the Religious Sciences,' by al-Ghazzali (ob. 1126 A.D.), whence they were collected and translated in the

Expository Times (Nov. and Duc. 1908, and Jan. 1904) by D. 8. Margoliouth

3. The storu-tellers — The profession of these persons does not differ tes inmuly from that of the preachers, but, as their purpose is only to entertain, they may be distinguished from those who aim at reforming. The work by Thalibi (d. 1936) cited above, called "Tales of the Prophets," emanates from this class, whom the more serious preachers repreach for their mendacity (Luraniyyan) of Abu I Ala of Maarrab, lt. 77, Cairo, 1986). The stories told by them are often purely the product of their fancy, though at times they go back to some apocraphal Gospel, or some passage of the Old Testament. The character of Christ, as it appears in Moslem fabrications, is modelled on that of the Sugl saint, who is a benevolent ascetic. But Arabi (d. 1240-A.), the chief mystami writer of Islam, accounts for the mild, philantitropis, and non-resistent character of Christianity by the fast that its ionnier was fatherless. That Christ will return to judge the world according to the law of Mohammed is a text on which his 'Meccan Revelations' contain many a homily. The Christian doctrine of the 'Son of God' was attributed by ingerious Moslems to a mureading of Pt 2' 'Thou art my Son, in Arabic bundayse, which should have been read mobiggins, are barely distinguishable (al Bhaith al Musagnom). In the anecdotes told by the preachers, the Apostless are ordinarly made to address him as 'O Spirit of God' or 'O Word of God' for both of which there is authority in the Koran. As has been pointed out above, the third Person of the Tririty was supposed by the Moslems to be the Virgin.

PAUL -- It is fortunate that our subject is limited for us at the outset. We are not called upon to consider the life and theology of St. Paul per se and in all their bearings, but only in that particular relation which belongs to a Dictionary of 'Christ and the Gospels.' That aspect alone of 'Christ and the Gospels.' That aspect alone is momentous enough. The figure of St. Paul looms so large and fills so much of the NT that he may well seem to stand between Jesus Christ and the history of the Christian Church. 'The Apostle' was the name given in the early Church the corpus of thurteen (or fourteen) Epistles called after him. And in the NT at least he does throw the other Apostles—or all but one—into the shade. The Epistle to the Hebrews, if not actually his, is allied to him in spirit. Even 1 Peter is impregnated with his teaching, however this has come about. If we are to believe many modern critics, we should have to number among his disciples the author of the Fourth Gospel and the three Johannine Epistles. The two really independent books are James and the Apocalypse.

It is indeed well to remind ourselves that this state of things is in part appearance. We are always at the mercy of our evidence, i.e. of such evidence as survives. And while St. Paul has ample justice done to him, the Judgan Apostles and the Judean Church have not. Still even this is a testimony to the energy and widespread influence of the Apostla of the Gentiles.

The fact remains that the dilated figure of St. Paul seems to bar the way between the subsequent history of Christianity and its Founder. And we are compelled to ask ourselves whether that history may not have undergone a certain amount of deflexion. In other words, Christianity in its first stage appears to have passed through a powerful medium; and the question is, whether that medium left it substantially unchanged, whether it still is what its Founder intended it to be. Two things strike us at once. One is, that the teaching of St. Paul, as compared with that of his Master, is highly theological. The apparent simplicity of the Gospels has given place to elaborate arguments and statements of dortrine. We shall consider the significance of this fact shortly; but in the meantime it rather forces itself upon our attention. And the second point is, that this Apostle whose influence has been so great was not one of the original Twelve, and was

These considerations are enough to make the question before us one of some urgency. We shall need to examine with all the closeness in our power the nature of the relation between St. Paul and Christ, or-what almost amounts to the same thing—between the Epistles (as represented by their central group) and the Gospels, as the two main divisions of the Christian half of the Bible. To do this methodically, we will break up our inquiry into the following heads.

I General character of St. Paul's teaching.
II. Data of St. Paul's theology.
III. Genesia of St. Paul's theology.
IV. St. Paul's knowledge of Christ.
V. Outlines of the Pauline theology.
VI. Comparison with the teaching of Jasus.
VII. Legitimacy of the Pauline construction.

I. General character of St. Paul's teaching.

-1. St. Paul the first Christian theologian on a larger scale.—It is true broadly to say that St. Paul is the first Christian theologian in the more technical sense of the word. He is the first to formulate doctrine on any considerable scale. The first Christians had their simple formulations: The first Christians had their simple formulations: such as that 'Jesus is Lord' (1 Co 12°), 'Jesus is the Christ' (Ac 5° 17°), 'Jesus is the Bon of God' (Ac 9°), 'He died for our sins according to the scriptures' (1 Co 15°), 'Christ rose from the dead the third day' (1 Co 15°), 'The Lord is at hand' (Ja 5°, 1 P 4°). Many of these occur in Pauline contexts, but in such a way as to show that St. Paul took them over from the common stock of Christian teaching. He way dayle added to and according to the common stock of Christian teaching. Christian teaching. He no doubt added to and expanded these simple formulæ. In his hands they became a theology—not exactly a system, in the sense in which (e.g.) Aristotle's Ethics or Calvin's Institutes are systems; for such coherent logical construction is alien to the Semitic mind, and St. Paul was thoroughly Semitic-but yet, at least, a body of reasoned and elaborated doctrines. In other words, the teaching of St. Paul is a great constructive effort of thought.

2. Place of theology in religion.—Now it is also true that at the present day, in certain wide circles, theology in this technical sense has a bad name It is regarded as something hard, cold, and formal, possessing, perhaps, a certain relative truth for the age to which it belongs, but hardly beyond this, and in our own age only a stumbling-block and hindrance to religion. But this is just one of those idola tribus that exaggerate a certain element of truth so far as to make it untrue. Theology is a necessity of lifefor the few, consciously; for the many, unconsciously, it is like philosophy. Every man really has his philosophy, expressed or implied. It is inevitable that thought should play upon subjects of such supreme interest; inevitable that it should true to formulate its balliefe and to be interest. try to formulate its beliefs, and to bring them into relation with one another. And if it does not do this upon right lines, it will do it upon wrong ones.

It is therefore a mistake to place theology, as religious thought, in contrast with religious feeling, and to call the one warm and living and the other cold and dead. It is the nature of feeling to be warm, and the nature of an intellectual process to be by comparison cold. But the two things should not be opposed to each other; they rather supplement and complete each other. They appeal to different faculties; the one supplies material for the other. Each without the other is wanting; and it is together that they become an activity of the whole man.

3. In the teaching of St. Paul there is no divorce between theology and religion.—In the teaching of St. Paul there is certainly no lack of religious emotion. And it is not fair to concentrate attention upon one side of his teaching and to ignore the other. What can be more intense or more elevated than the feeling of Ro 8"1-in, or more exquisitely delicate than that of 1 Co 13? And passages like the first of those and Ro 11. are striking examples of the way in which theological thought supplies the ground for, and passes into, religious emotion. The controversial argument of Gal. is not the most attractive part of the Apostle's writings; but how lovely are the pictures of Gal 5. at 61. at And yet these pictures are in closest contact with his theology. Indeed, the sustained enthusiasm which is so characteristic of the Apostle is kindled directly by his convictions (2 Co 514, Ro 51-11).

IL Data of 36. Pan's theology.—St. Paul's theology, then, was an effort of intellectual construction. And the first question that meets us in, What had he to build with?

1. Old Testament.—Like his Master, St. Paul

1. Old Testament.—Like his Master, St. Paul had behind him the OT as an authoritative volume, a sacred book. He was himself to bear a part in laying the foundation of another excred book; but this, after all, was but a second volume in continuation of the first, and which in course of time came to be placed upon the same level with it. The OT was the religious authority from which all Christians alike started. And yet new conditions had to be met in new ways.
The Master boldly laid down a new law: 'Ye have heard that it was said to them of old time... but I say unto you' (Mt 5<sup>25,6</sup> etc.). The disciple could not do this; but when, at a critical stage in his career, he found himself in collision with the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great the letter of the older Scriptures are the same than the letter of the older Scriptures, he showed great the letter of the older Scriptures are the same of the same transfer of the older Scriptures are the same of the same transfer of the older Scriptures are the same of skill in turning the edge of the arguments directed against him, by the use of current methods of

2. Contemporary Judaiem, Rabbinical and Apocalyptic.—Generally speaking, the Apostle was in regard to the interpretation of the OT at the common level of his time. But he rose at the common level of his time. But he rose above this through his superior insight and strong grasp of religious principle. The OT really was a revelation from God and the work of inspired men; and by virtue of his essential kinship with these St. Paul was able to elicit from it deeper truth than his contemporaries. His methods are truth than his contemporaries. His methods are not exactly those which the Christian excepts of to-day cannot help adopting; but, as he had the heart of the matter, and the OT writers also had in their measure the heart of the matter, his interpretations are really in harmony with all that was best in them. We might take as an average his transferrent of Almhan's faith. There that was best in them. We might take as an example his treatment of Abraham's faith. There are in the OT the two elements of Law and Faith; and their ultimate relation to each other in the counsels of God is not really different from that which St. Paul made it to be.

It was not, however, purely a question of inter-pretation. On the common basis of the OT, the contemporaries of St. Paul had developed a number of inferences and ideas which the Apostle began by sharing with them. We may distinguish—not sharply, and as though they were mutually exclusive, but rather as at one time in alliance and at another in opposition—two main streams, the Rabbinical and the Apocalyptic. From the second century of our era onwards the former became more and more dominant, while the latter dropped into the back ground. And, even in the time of St. Paul, the official classes inclined strongly to Rabburism. official classes inclined strongly to if it was chiefly the freer speculation a that took the shape which is for Apocalypses. used it as it suited him. But he was not in bondage to it, and he applied it in connexion with root ideas that were peculiarly his own.

3. The teaching and life of Christ.—The touchstone that St. Paul applied to the current ideas of his day and generation was their bearing upon his own intense faith in Christ. Those which proved capable of assimilation to this he retained and worked into his own tracking there which worked into his own teaching; those which were not capable of assimilation he simply let drop. We have spoken of faith in Christ; it is a

We have spoken of faith in Christ; it is a further question how far this faith is related to detailed knowledge of Christ's life and teaching. We shall have to estimate the extent of this presently. For the moment we need only note that, whether in greater or less degree, St. Paul must have had some such knowledge, and that knowledge must have played some part in the construction of his theology.

L. Palestinian traditions.—Nearly all his know ledge of Christ must have come to St. Paul mediately, and not immediately. It seems a natural inference from 2 Co 5th that the Apostle had at least had sight of Jesus during His lifetime; but it can hardly have been more than this, or his self-accusations would have been even more bitter than they were. We are coming very soon to the question of the information about Christ which St. Paul derived from others. But, besides this, there must have been in any case those simple formule to which we have already referred, in formulæ to which we have already referred, in which the first disciples summed up their fundamental beliefs. We shall see later how St. Paul dealt with these; but they must at least have formed the starting-point of his own more adventurous and developed thinking.

III. Geneils of St. Paul's theology.—We have seen what were the materials that St. Paul had to work upon. The other leading factor that gave shape to his thoughts was the subjective habit and attitude that he brought to hear upon these materials. On this head, too, there are some remarks to be made.

materiala. On this remarks to be made.

1. St. Paul not an immediate disciple of Christ. -No doubt it is an important fact, and from one point of view a defect and loss, that St. Paul had not been a personal companion of Christ. And yet, when we look a little further, we can see a certain appropriateness that he should have come upon the stage as he did, and at the point where upon the stage as he did, and at the point where he did. Christianity consists not only in a particular body of teaching, but also in the working of great spiritual forces that flow from the incarnation of Jesus Christ. That is to say, it includes not only the teaching of Christ, but an estimate, or apprehension, of His Person and

From this side it was not altogether a disquali-fication that the Apostle's outlook should be directed forwards rather than backwards. The Tennyson's well-known lines holds principle of good, that the past does not present itself in a complete and rounded from to those who are actually moving in it. So we may well believe that the first disciples were for a time immersed in the details of their own recollections, and that their greep on the whole as a whole was weaker their grasp on the whole as a whole was weaker in consequence. In proportion as St. Paul was less involved in such concrete details, his grasp on the central idea of his faith seems to have been all the stronger. This may seem at first sight paradoxical; but there are paradoxes in the use which God makes of His instruments. There was a sense in which the knowledge of Christ after the flesh hindered rather than helped the apprehension of Him according to the spirit.

I Him according to the spirit.

1. His temperament and training.—St. Paul was not one of those who need for their mestal sustenance a great wealth of concrete details. He had the gift of religious imagination, to fill out an idea or an impression and convert it into a powerful motive. So the vision on the road to Damascus held his fascinated gaze throughout his career. It worked ceaselessly within, and dominated all his thinking.

And then we have to remember that according to the standards of his time St. Paul was highly educated. His bent was intellectual, and it was encouraged by his training. When he sat at the feet of Gamaliel, he must have heard problems discussed like the faith of Abraham, to which we have already referred, or the origin of evil desire in connexion with the Fall of man. These active discussions took with him the place that books do with us. St. Paul was learned as his age counted learning, and he could not help treating the questions that arose after the manner of the learned.

3. Spiritual experience.—But a deeper influence than learning was his own spiritual experience. Continually we see this living experience reflected in what comes to us as doctrine. St. Paul taught what he had first felt, and he verified his teaching by experience. We shall naturally illustrate this when we come to speak of his theology more in detail.

4. The teaching of history.—At the same time St. Paul was not a mere student, but an active missionary, who soon came to be burdened with 'the care of all the churches.' He had something else to do besides following the logic of his own thought. The controversy with the Judaizers was one important episode in his life: and this had a great influence upon the form which his teaching

Later on, when the victory was won, when the free admission of the Gentiles was secured and Jewish churches and Gentile churches stood over against each other on an equal footing, the Apostle is able to see the Divine purpose running through the alternate acceptance and rejection, and to map out the periods of history as the balance swayed now to one side and now to the other. The letters of St. Paul all bear traces, more or less distinct, of the occasions which called them forth. If, as we believe, the Pastoral Epistles are his, their different tone and style can only be accounted for by the special object with which they were written.

For the sake of clearness we have tried to distinguish the particular causes that contributed to make the theology of St. Paul what it is. But because we have singled out these causes, we of course do not suppose that only one was at work at a time. Very often two or more were at work together, subtly blended and passing into each other. The abstract distinctions that the mind creates always have about them something artificial; and yet history becomes clearer when the process of analysis precedes that of synthesis.

IV. St. Paul's knowledge of Christ.—We now come to the direct question, What means had St. Paul of knowing about Jesus, and what did he know? We will take the latter half of this question first, as being the less speculative, and as helping us to answer the first.

1. Extent of his knowledge. - We are speaking now of the historical Jesus, and not of the glorified Christ. And here we are met at the outset by exaggerated statements, that St. Paul had little or no interest in the historical Jesus, and knew little or nothing about Him. It is coming to be seen that these statements are exaggerated, and in recent years allowance is being made for knowledge on a considerably larger scale than used to be the case (see, for instance, the opinions mentioned by Knowling, The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, pp. 201-204, 503-518). There are, however, certain points that we are obliged to leave undecided.

(i.) The most important of these has reference to the two well-known passages in which St. Paul appears to show detailed knowledge—1 Co 11<sup>28-28</sup> (the institution of the Lord's Supper) and 15<sup>2-8</sup> (the appearances after the Resurrection). Are these passages to be treated as just samples of St. Paul's ordinary knowledge—so that he might, if he had pleased, have described other incidents in the Lord's life with equal fulness and pre-cision? Or are we to take these two specimens of detailed information as something altogether exceptional and abnormal? For ourselves, we believe that the first alternative is far nearer the truth than the second. The very precision with which the Apostle writes looks as if he were drawing from a well furnished store. On the other hand, the paucity of the references proves hardly anything. There is frequently something that will seem to be capricious in our experience of such matters—the proportion in which a writer protect what he wight have contact. quotes what he might have quoted. We have to remember that, if this one Epistle had chanced not to survive, we should have had no evidence that St. Paul possessed detailed knowledge of this kind at all. This, then, is our own belief; but at the same time, if it is questioned, we cannot profess to make it good to demonstration.

(ii.) We note further that there are express appeals to 'words of the Lord' in 1 Co 710 and 914. Besides these, there are coincidences of expression so striking as almost to amount to quotation in Ro 12<sup>14</sup>, 1 Co 4<sup>12</sup> 13 6<sup>5</sup> 12<sup>2</sup> 3.

(iii.) Again, St. Paul shows a marked insight into the character of Jesus as it is described in the Gospels. He singles out exactly those traits ('the meekness and gentleness of Christ,' 2 Co 10') which the Jesus of the Gospels took as characteristic of Himself ('Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart,' Mt 11<sup>29</sup>). Other allusions point in the same direction (a.g. Ph. 95-8)

(iv.) Really this insight into the character of (iv.) Really this insight into the character of Christ is part of a phenomenon that strikes us on a larger scale. The hortatory passages of St. Paul's Epistles show that he understood to a nicety the new religious ideal introduced by Christ. The ideal was really a new one. The nearest approach to it was that of 'the poor' in the Psalter, 'the poor in spirit' of the Gospel (Mt 5'). But even these were not free from vindictiveness; they were not prepared to say 'Love your enemies. they were not prepared to say, 'Love your enemies, and pray for them that persecute you,' or 'If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him to drink' (Mt 5<sup>44</sup>, Ro 12<sup>20</sup>). It is not merely a question of verbal parallelism; the whole conception is really the same. It could not be more perfectly delineated than it is in 1 Co 13. When it is contended (as it is, e.g., by Wrede, Paulus, p. 91) that St. Paul is thinking mainly of those who are brethren in the faith, that is really not the case; his exhortations are in no way confined to the relations of the brethren to one another.

2. Sources of this knowledge.—That there is a real connexion, and a close connexion, between the ideal laid down by Christ and that inculcated by St. Paul cannot be denied; it is really one and the same. How did St. Paul acquire the know-ledge of it? He must have done so in no merely transient manner; he must have had the ideal so completely set before him that it sank deep into his soul.

(i.) In spite of the independence which he claims for himself, we know that St. Paul had long and familiar intercourse with disciples, like Barnabas and Mark, and with others in the church at Antioch (Ac 131), who could not fail to instruct him as to what was new and distinctive in the teaching of Christ. In Gal 118 he speaks of himself as paying a visit to Peter at Jerusalem and spending a fortnight in his company. Both there and in Gal 2<sup>2</sup> a considerable comparing of notes seems to be implied. There are sufficient indications of oral intercourse between St. Paul and the older disciples to explain the knowledge

(ii.) Had he, in addition to this, anything in writing that he could refer to? He cannot have had access to our present Gospels; but is it not possible that he may have had in his hands one or other of the documents out of which our present Gospels are composed? The Mark-Gospel is excluded by its date; but not so the second main document, often called Logia, and now generally known by the symbol Q. There is nothing, so far as we can see, in this document to make it impossible for St. Paul to have had the opportunity possible for St. Paul to have had the opportunity of consulting it. If we are right in forming our conception of it from the passages common to St. Matthew and St. Luke that are not found in St. Mark, it would be a work of precisely such a character as would bring out clearly the new moral ideal taught by Christ. We may well believe that this was really the object with which it was composed that it was a manual for Christian missioneries to put into the hands of Christian missionaries to put into the hands of their converts as supplying them with a rule of life. The principal argument against this view is that, if it was early enough to be used by St. Paul, it is difficult to see why it should not have been used by St. Mark. Some scholars think that it was used by him, but we should not like to commit ourselves to that alternative. question must be left open.

On the other hand, the markedly individual character of the two chief specimens of the Pauline tradition, as compared with the Gospels, would go to show that the sources from which he drew were distinct from those used by our present Evangelists.

Y. Outlines of the Pauline theology.—As we have already implied, the great and central event in St. Paul's career was his conversion. It is this that really gives the key to his theology. It deterthat really gives the key to his theology. It deter-mined for him at once his conception of Christ, and the nature of his own response to the appeal which Christ made to him.

1. The glorified Christ.—The vision that he saw was of Christ glorified. In other words, Christ appeared to him as Spirit; and it is this spiritual Christ that henceforth controlled his experience. And yet, not that alone. The glorified Christ was none the less identical with the crucified Jesus of Nazareth. It is in this double aspect that the exalted Form that he saw made such an intense impression upon the Apostle.

2. Christ within.—The vision was for him; it appealed personally and directly to him; and he responded with all the ardour of his being. It was as if he clasped to his heart the image of Christ that he saw, and it entered into him and possessed him. Or, conversely, it might be said that the extended arms of the Christ whom he saw embraced and enfolded himself. These two ways of speaking St. Paul always treats as equivalent—to say that he clasped Christ or that Christ clasped him, that he was 'in Christ' or that Christ was 'in him,' meant the same thing. The same act had a Divine meant the same thing. The same act had a Divine side and a human; and the one corresponded to the other. The process of which the Apostle was conscious in himself had to be repeated in his converts (Gal 4<sup>19</sup>). It is all a way of expressing the closest appropriation, assimilation, and union.

3. Faith.—In another connexion St. Paul calls the act by which he entered into this relation 'faith.' This act of faith could be expressed intellectually as assent to the proposition that 'Jesus is the Christ,' or that 'Jesus is Lord.' But any such process of the intellect was swallowed up at once in the warmer emotion of loyalty, gratifude, and adoring love. We must think of it always as love for One who is in heaven and not on earth, and tor Une who is in heaven and not on earth, and therefore as at one and the same time love and adoration. It is this which gives its peculiar quality and value to 'faith,' as St. Paul conceived it. The impression that the Apostle received was so overpowering, that it seemed to make his whole life a different thing; 'a new creation,' he called it himself (Gal 6<sup>18</sup>); 'the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me' (2<sup>20</sup>) leved me, and gave himself for me' (220).

4. The death of Christ. — We go back to the Damascus vision. It was proof that Jesus of Nazareth, whose followers the Apostle in his blindness had persecuted, was no mere ambitious blindness had persecuted was no mere ambitious. pretender, but all that His disciples believed Him to be—both Lord and Christ. But if that was so, the apparently shameful death that He died could not be really shameful: whatever appearance it were in the eyes of men, there must really be in it a Divine virtue—a virtue infinite, because Divine.

Already in the infant Church, following, as we believe, hints of the Lord Himself, there was a tendency to explain the death of the Crucified by means of principles inherent in the OT, by the idea of sacrifice and by the idea of vicarious suffering; on the one hand, by the analogy of the Levitical sacrifices, and, on the other hand, by the description of the Servant of Jahweh in Deutero-Isaiah. St. Paul took up these ideas, and worked them out in his own manner: the sacrificial idea, especially in Ro 3<sup>26</sup> 5<sup>5</sup>, 1 Co 5<sup>7</sup> (cf. He 9<sup>22</sup>); the vicarious idea, esp. in 2 Co 5<sup>21</sup>. St. Paul also added a new explanation of his own in Gal 3<sup>15</sup>. This last might be described as somewhat Rabbinical; but the ciples of sacrifice and of vicariousness are deeply impressed upon God's world; and that they should culminate in a supreme act of self-devotion has in it nothing incredible.

5. Justification and reconciliation.—The death of Christ established a new relation between God and man. It established it, as it were, objectively and ideally. For it to take full effect, man had to do his part; he had to realize the new relation in a reformed and regenerate life. But the Christian was allowed to anticipate this. He had not to wait for the Divine forgiveness, which was vouchsafed to him at once as soon as he became a Christian and was launched upon that career of amendment and advance to which as a Christian he was pledged. St. Paul uses a judicial term, and describes the convert from the first as 'justified,' i.e. 'declared righteous' or 'acquitted.' This is the Divine answer to the faith by which he makes his profession and has it sealed by baptism. By this decisive act the Christian enters at once into the circle of the Divine favour; he is received as a son reconciled to his Heavenly Father, as a prodigal returned. Henceforth his course is not one of weary effort and failure, but the way is smoothed for him and brightened by the Father's love.

This was one way of describing the process.

Another way turned round St. Paul's characteristic manner of conceiving the relation of the Christian to Christ of which we have spoken. We have said that in St. Paul's own experience the vision of the exalted Christ was, as it were, clasped to his heart. The act was so intense and so absorbing that it amounted to a kind of identification: 'No longer I, but Christ liveth in me.' And yet this ideal Christ still wears the features of the historical Christ. It is the Christ who died and rose again. The Christian who is identified with such a Christ must himself also die and rise again—in such sense as he can, i.e. in a moral and religious sense; he must die to sin, and rise again to newness of life (Ro 61-11); he must emerge from the imprisonment in which he is held by sin into the free and spacious life of the Spirit (see below).

6. Law and grace.—In his earlier experience, religion for St. Paul, as for the rest of his countrymen, meant primarily obedience to law; to be righteous was to keep the Law. But that was really an impossible task. The Law might command, but it could not secure performance. Human nature was too weak to keep up obedience to its rigorous behests. In the multitude of rules and precepts there were always some that were neglected. And to break the Law in any degree was to break it, and to forfeit the reward of well-doing.

It was otherwise with the service of Christ. Here the motive was personal loyalty and devotion, carried out under the conditions which have just been described, with the assurance of forgiveness, of Divine favour and Divine aid. Thus, whatever might be its outward conditions, the life of the Christian was one of inward joy and peace.

An incidental consequence of this new experience was that in his controversy with the Judaizers St. Paul was able to take his stand upon a broad ground of principle. He was able to contrast Christianity with Judaism as a higher type of religion, as a reign of Grace over against a reign of Law.

7. Developed Christology.—At this point we may turn to consider St. Paul's contribution to the Christian doctrine of God. So far as Christianity brought a change in this doctrine, it all arose from the recognition of the Divine nature and mission of that recognition brought with it. Jesus Himself had certainly come as the promised Messiah, though during His life on earth the full supernatural attributes of the Messiah were veiled and restrained. The Resurrection was the decisive proof that they were really there; and from that time onwards the little band of believers proclaimed openly the central article of its faith. It did so especially under the double title of Messiah and Son of God. St. Paul took over these titles in the full depth of their meaning. We have seen that for him the Messiah was especially the glorified Messiah. That was, indeed, since the Resurrection, essentially the case with all Christians, but St. Paul grasped his belief with peculiar intensity and concentration. Whereas, too, the title 'Son of God,' though literally and strictly meant, was used by the first disciples in a way that was naïve and unreflective, St. Paul evidently dwelt upon it, and pressed its full metaphysical meaning. He had clearly satisfied himself that the manifestations of Christ's Divine Southing pression and patterns of the control of Divine Sonship required nothing short of this. And then, as we might expect, he went on to make use of other terms that his speculative training naturally suggested, to illustrate and carry home the same fundamental idea.

8. God the Father.—There are three ways in which St. Paul adds to the doctrine of God the Father: (i.) By discriminating and correlating the spheres of Him whom we call God the Father and of Him whom we call God the Son. The designations were already current, and the tendency to discriminate or define all grew out of the Incarnation. There is not much set teaching, but there are many side allusions which testify to considerable activities of the relations to the continuous side allusions which testify to considerable activities of the relations.

calling attention to the work of the Son as revealing the character of the Father. The whole scheme (so to speak) of the Incarnation proceeds from the Father, and therefore itself bears witness, more direct and more unmistakable than any other, to the love which underlies the dealings of God with man—to the love not only of the Son who becomes incarnate and who suffers for human sin, but also to that of the Father who sent Him (Ro 5<sup>5</sup>, 2 Co 5<sup>12, 14, 17, 18</sup>, Col 1<sup>13, 29</sup>).—(iii.) By marking out in a sort of broad chronology the periods of the world's history (Ro 9–11, 1 Co 15<sup>20–28</sup>). It is, no doubt, possible to press particular expressions (such as Ro 9<sup>17, 18</sup>) in such a way as to make them conflict both with the free will of man and with the justice of God. That was not at all the Apostle's intention, but only to enforce that strong sense of a providential ordering of successive events which must be felt by every religious mind.

9. The Holy Spirit.—The belief in the Holy Spirit was just shared by St. Paul with his fellow-Christians. The remarkable phenomena which they saw around them—prophecy, speaking with tongues, exorcisms, and the like—were all in the language of the time naturally referred to His activity. St. Paul did but adopt this language, and then perhaps extend it, more than his neighbours were in the habit of doing, to phenomena that were less extraordinary but more deeply related to the moral and religious life (we remember that 1 Co 13 comes in the midst of a long passage dealing with gifts of the Spirit). It is noticeable that he—not alone, but in company (e.g.) with Lk. in Ac 167 (RV)—expressly associates the Spirit, not only with God, but with Christ (Ro 88).

10. The Church and the Sacraments.—It was obvious and natural that the blessings brought by

10. The Church and the Sacraments.— It was obvious and natural that the blessings brought by Christ must hold good in the first instance for those who rallied to the cause of Christ, and ratified their adhesion to Him by confession and baptism. The society so formed could not but start with a position of privilege analogous to that of the Jewish Church under the old dispensation. But neither under the one dispensation nor under the other was that position of privilege given only to be selfishly enjoyed. For the OT see Is 22-4 1110 1918-38 421-7 495, Mic 41-3 etc. It was just an instance of 'the purpose of God according to selection.' The recipients of it were to be missionaries who were to carry the gospel to the end of the world.

This was always the ulterior object with which Christians were to use and enjoy their privileges (Ro 11<sup>26</sup> 10<sup>15-18</sup>). They might enjoy them, but they were bound to do what in them lay to spread them. Therefore, when St. Paul enlarges upon the felicity of being a Christian (e.g. in Ro 5<sup>1-11</sup>), it is in no spirit of narrowness or exclusiveness, but rather the contrary (as appears from ch. 11). The exhortations to the Church to organize itself as efficiently as possible, and to prosecute the Christian life to the uttermost, must all be taken with this tacit condition.

The two Sacraments belong to the internal organization of the Church. They are neither of them due to the initiation of St. Paul. He found them in existence, and he fully accepted them, and from time to time he dwells upon them in such a way as to show that he was well aware of their significance and value. St. Paul distinctly recognizes them as means of grace essential to the life of Christians. We cannot at all accept the view that he was the first to introduce repeated acts of communion; 1 Co 11<sup>25, 26</sup> implies that he found it a regular practice.

tions were already current, and the tendency to discriminate or define all grew out of the Incarnation. There is not much set teaching, but there are many side allusions which testify to considerate many side allusions which testify the side of the side it in the Gospels. In proportion as we go back in time to the earliest Epp., this element is seen at its greatest. In 1 and 2 Thess. it is the main topic, and in 1 Cor. it is very prominent. It became less so as time went on, but even in the latest period it does not wholly disappear (Ph 45).

The Pauline Epp. are even more important still from the part that they play in covering the transi-tion from a form of Christianity in which eschatotion from a form of Christianty in which eschatology is prominent, to one in which it has fallen into the background. In the later Epp. the basis of Christianity has been silently shifted; its foundations have been 'underpinned' by doctrines of more permanent applicability—esp. by the stress that is laid upon the working of the glorified Christ or the Spirit of Christ.

YI. Comparison with the teaching of Christ. We are now in a better position to take a coup d'œil of the relation of St. Paul's mission and teaching as a whole to that of his Master. It has been rightly observed by more than one of those who have treated of the subject (see Knowling, Testimony of St. Paul to Christ, p. 514), that the Gospel of St. Paul begins where the earthly life of Jesus ends. The dictum needs some qualification as we have seen). but it is in the main true. It (as we have seen); but it is in the main true. It means that the elaborate Pauline theology is of the nature of a development, so that what we have to consider is how and in what sense it is a development.

1. The teaching of Jesus presupposed.—That this was the case, we may see (i.) from the easy and natural allusions to the character of Christ and of the Christian ideal (§§ IV. 1. (iii.) (iv.) above); (ii.) from the general position in the earlier Epp. on the subject of eschatology, which directly continues the attitude described in the Gospels; (iii.) and, in particular, from the conception of the 'Kingdom of God.' This last point is so important that we must give it a section to itself.

2. The Kingdom of God in St. Paul.—There is no exposition of the idea of the Kingdom; it is taken for granted as well known. There are several examples in Epp. of all dates in which the phrase is used in its ordinary future sense: e.g. Gal 5<sup>21</sup>, 1 Co 6<sup>21</sup>. Eph 5<sup>5</sup>. Similar to these is the use in 1 Th 2<sup>12</sup>. But by the side of these are other passages in which the Kingdom is evidently present. Such would be: 1 Co 4<sup>20</sup> 'the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power'; in Col 1<sup>12</sup> 1<sup>14</sup> is the other of present foreigness in which the Charles sphere of present forgiveness into which the Christian is translated; in Col 4<sup>11</sup> it has reference to the work of missions. But most significant of all is Ro 14<sup>17</sup> the kingdom of God is not eating and drinking, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. Here the Kingdom is entirely a present idea, and it seems to cover the whole range of the gospel. Nothing could better mark the transition spoken of above.

3. Pauline developments.—So far, the teaching of St. Paul has been just a continuation of the teaching of Christ. But in the outlines of his theology which have been sketched above it will have been seen that there is much which goes beyond this. This developed teaching has reference primarily and especially to the conception of the Person of Christ. Another new element is the elaborate psychological analysis of the process of belief, and generally of the Christian habit of mind. And lastly, as we have seen, there is certain special teaching that has grown out of the circumstances of the time.

4. Origin of the developments.—It would be an utter mistake to suppose that St. Paul's teaching as to the Person of Christ was a new invention of his own. We have seen that it was really nothing more than a further analysis of the meaning contained in the simple doctrinal formulæ of the primitive Church: such as that 'Jesus is Lord,' 'Jesus is the Christ,' 'Jesus is the Son of God.' It would be equally an utter mistake to imagine that the be equally an utter mistake to imagine that the primitive Church was going against the will of Jesus Himself. There are indications enough that it was in no sense doing this. The only thing that has given any colour to such an idea is the great reticence and reserve that our Lord showed in putting forward His claims. There is something of a problem in this. But that Jesus knew Himself to be both Messiah and Son, we may regard as quite certain.

It is true that St. Paul reflected upon these titles, and true that in all his teaching his own experience entered as a shaping force; but it is just that fact which gives to his teaching such depth of reality.

VII. Legitimacy of the Pauline construction. It may be said, not without truth, by way of discounting these Pauline developments: (i.) that the methods of argument by which they are supported, especially the exegetical methods, are not always what we should consider valid; (ii.) that the personal experience on which they rest is exceptional and peculiar; and (iii.) that, in like manner, the conditions of early Christian history by which they were shaped necessarily had about them something relative and transient.

But, on the other hand: (i.) few propositions are more true than the proverbial one, that conclusions are often more right than the explicit reasoning that leads up to them. Methods of proof are often of the nature of a scaffolding the real purpose of which is to get up a contract of which is to set up a construction in presentable shape, when it verifies itself after the fact by its own inherent properties in the experimental field

(ii.) It is not to be denied that the personal experience of St. Paul has in it much that is exceptional and peculiar. But that is far more because tional and peculiar. But that is far more because of its penetrating intensity along lines that are common to lesser men, than because there is in it anything eccentric that disqualifies his experience from representing theirs. In other words, St. Paul was a religious genius of the highest order that human nature has ever produced—in the same category with the writer whom we call Second Isaiah, with Jeremiah, with many of the Psalmists, with St. John, and at a later date with that astonishing genius, St. Augustine. We believe that men like these were specially raised up by God, and endowed by His Spirit with many marvel-God, and endowed by His Spirit with many marvellous gifts, for the express purpose of pointing out the way in which the crowd of religious people may follow, of setting before them an ideal after the heights and depths of which they may strive. We have only to think of the consummate beauty of the chapter on Charity, which, after all, is but the culmination of other passages that are strewn thick over the hortatory portions of the Epistles; and to remember, along with this, that such passages do but translate the theoretic side of theology into the activities of daily life.

(iii.) It might be said of each of the foregoing heads, and it may be said specially of that which turns upon the relativity of the teaching that emerges from history, that at most the objection does but amount to this, that the theology of St. Paul, so far as it rests on the grounds enumerated, is subject to the conditions of all things human. All things human are relative, and relative, in particular, to the age to which they belong. But in this class at least of things human, while there is the perishable envelope which is inevitably stripped off by time, there is no less something permanent as well, a permanent residuum or deposit —not always definable in words, but very real and very precious—which passes on into all the ages that follow. This we believe to be true pre-eminently of the first age of Christianity, and true, in particular, in a very high degree of the teaching of St. Paul. The world since his day—and not the Christian world alone—has drawn sustenance from it to an extent of which it is probable that, with all its eulogies of the Apostle, it has never been fully aware. There is a large ingredient of Pauline teaching in the very life-blood that courses in a Christian's veins.

Christian's veins.

LITERATURE.—The subject of St. Paul in his relation to Christ has been much discussed in recent years, and that on critical and modern lines. The larger works are: Feine, Jesus Christus und Paulus (1902); Goguel, L'Apotre Paul et Jésus-Christ (1904); and in English, Knowling, Witness of the Episties (1892), and The Testimony of St. Paul to Christ (1905). Dr. Knowling's two books are written with exhaustive knowledge, and with his invariable lucidity and accuracy of statement and admirable temper; they cover a wide extent of surface, and all that can be said on the other side is that, perhaps owing to some defect of construction, they may seem to be more upon the surface than they really are. There is a crowd of smaller tracts and articles, for the most part dating from the last two or three years. Among these may be mentioned: H. J. Hottsmann, 'Jesus und Paulus' in Prot. Monatschrift (1900); Kölbing, Die geistige Einseirkung der Person Jesus auf Paulus (1906); Wrede, Paulus 2(1907); Jüllicher, Paulus und Jesus (1907) [both in the series of Religions-geschichtliche Volksbücher]; Julius Kaftan, Jesus und Paulus (1906); and Arnold Meyer, Wer hat das Christenthum begründet Jesus oder Paulus (1907). Of these, the writer thinks that he has derived most from the two tracts of Wrede and Jülicher—from Wrede in a negative sense, and from Jülicher in a positive. Wrede has constituted himself a sort of advocatus diaboli in the case of St. Paul: his writings are all marked by very great sincerity; and his sincerity takes the form of bringing all the objectsons that the natural man of the twentieth century might be moved to bring. Wrede's striking career was cut short somewhat abruptly on 23rd Nov. 1906. Jülicher's pamphlet the writer believes to be one of the very best productions of its author; when allowance is made for the point of view, it is full of sympathy and insight. Kaftan is also very good, but not quite so good in the second part of his little treatise as in the first. The anon. work, The Fifth Gospel: being the Pauline Interpretation of the Christ (1907), and Du Bose, The Gosp. acc. to St. Paul (1907), may also be recommended.
